There may be parts of the country in which the task of making the appointment to the joint board, the other tier, will be left in the hands of a leader of a political party. That would not be unknown. In some cases that duty may even be delegated to the chief whip. He might be the chief whip of the Labour or Tory party, or—although it is a bit far-fetched—of the Liberal party. But there might be times when the appointment — I stress "appointment" — was made by the chief whip.

Even if the person is elected, there is such a thing as a consolation election. Anyone who has been a member of a Labour or Tory group will know that the important positions are filled by members of the district council. They choose who will be chairman of this and that, and then a few consolation prizes have to be handed out. In some circumstances, the consolation prizes may be given to those who fail to obtain positions on their own district councils.

There is also the removal technique. In order to get rid of, for example, the chairman of the housing committee, one makes sure that he is appointed to the second-tier authority not because he is particularly good at running refuse disposal or the fire brigade, but because that will remove him from competition for jobs at the district council level. There are many other options, but the point is that clause 22 deals with appointments and not elections. There can be no doubt that when second-tier authorities are appointed in this way they bear comparison with an arranged marriage. One gets someone whom one did not choose for oneself and who is chosen for one. In Hamlet's words, that is not "a consummation Devoutly to be wish'd".

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that certainly among the Asian community many arranged marriages turn out to be highly successful and very happy? Perhaps that will be the case in this instance.

Mr. Fraser: I hope that the hon. Gentleman tells that to the Home Secretary, who prevents parties to arranged marriages from coming into the country. Let the hon. Gentleman make that point elsewhere.

The sort of arranged appointment that does not involve the electorate is to be opposed. We oppose it by being against all abolition in clause 1. That is why we shall not pick and choose as the Liberals do, and why we shall abstain on this amendment, just as we abstained last night on the GLC amendment, which was utterly contradictory.

Mr. Hind: The amendment will raise many eyebrows. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that the Liberal party was not keen, and never had been keen, on the metropolitan counties. Thus, we must ask ourselves why, in those circumstances, this amendment has been introduced.

Let us have recourse to the manifesto that was put forward in 1983 by the alliance party. The manifesto spoke about local government and said that the party planned to "revitalise local government, restoring its independence and its accountability to the local electorate by . . . simplifying the structure of local government to make it more effective by abolishing one of the existing tiers of Government. This will be done by stages against the background of our proposals for the development of regional government. It would inevitably involve the eventual abolition of the MCCs and the GLC (not ILEA) and would also allow for the restoration of powers to some of the former county boroughs."

That is just what the Bill does. The alliance seems to have done a complete about face. Consequently, we wonder whether it might not have pushed the amendment if it did not think that there were votes to be had in clinging on to some of those dinosaurs of local government.

The Liberals and the SDP cannot agree between themselves. In The Social Democrat of 28 January 1983 the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said:

"The present two-tier system of local government is costly, wasteful and bureaucratic. Social Democrats should be campaigning for a simplification of local government bringing the control of key services closer to the people. That means moving towards a single tier structure which everyone can understand."

Then comes the most important statement:

"The first step should be the scrapping of the GLC and the metropolitan counties."

I shall be interested to see which Lobby the hon. Member for Woolwich goes into tonight.

During the general election the hon. Member for Woolwich said:

"As regional government grows, one of the existing tiers of local government will be abolished; the GLC and the metropolitan counties will disappear but local communities will have statutory parish or neighbourhood councils."

Those words appeared in the Estates Gazette of 21 May. It was the same theme right the way through, and it was not until after the election that the alliance turned towards saying that we should hang on to those authorities. It is arrant hypocrisy to turn round when it is politically expedient to bring forward such an amendment and say that perhaps we should all change our minds and go into the Lobby to try to keep the metropolitan county councils.

Today, the Labour party advocates support of the metropolitan county councils. It at least has the consistency on this matter to abstain. I unerstand that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) is a member of the Labour party's Front Bench team. After the election, and after this Government had clearly stated their intention to abolish the metropolitan county councils, he said:

"I do not intend to lift one legislative finger to stop the return of single-tier government to Birmingham. That was the view of all the City councillors and it was clearly the view of all West Midland MPs before the election."

Those words come from the Sutton Coldfield News of 23 September 1983.

When concluding the recent Second Reading debate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the Labour party's spokesman, at least three times to say whether a Labour Government would reintroduce the metropolitan counties. The answer must be no, because the hon. Gentleman refused to answer the question. Perhaps I can refer Labour Members to their manifesto of 1983, which stated:

"We aim to end if we can the confusing division of services between two tiers of authority. Unitary district authorities in England and Wales could be responsible for all the functions in this area that they could sensibly undertake."

The Labour party's policy was clearly to have one unitary system of local government and not to preserve the two-tier system. Perhaps the Labour party falls into the same category as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey—if there were no votes in it, they would not oppose the Bill.

6.30 pm

In 1972, when the present system was set up, it was noticeable that the Labour party fought against the proposals. The Bill provides for a return of functions to authorities which are sufficiently large to deal with the problems of all local government matters, including strategic planning. Those who have lived in large county boroughs know that they can deal with all the major functions of local government, and should be allowed to do so. They are closer to the electorate. There are many more district councillors than county councillors. To much of the public, councils with headquarters 15 or 20 miles away are irrelevant.

I was born and bred a Lancastrian. In 1972 someone told me, "I am sorry, you are not a Lancastrian any more; you belong to the county of Greater Manchester." I am sure that that gladdened the hearts of citizens of Bury, Salford, Bolton and other such areas. Likewise, the Wirral, Birkenhead and Southport became part of Merseyside. Most of the metropolitan counties geographically identify with no one. The general public have no empathy with them. They are distant and irrelevant.

Little of the government of London is carried out by the GLC. Assuming that most of the transport functions—especially buses—are taken away from the metropolitan counties, what will be left for them? They do not have the major functions of education, social services and transport — other than a responsibility for major roads and strategic planning. The district boroughs that carry out planning functions can easily extend them to strategic planning. They are quite capable of handling structure plans, because that is what they do on a day-to-day basis. They can carry on precisely where the metropolitan counties leave off.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) referred to the boards. A district council has eight or 10 committees, so, inevitably, a councillor will serve on only two or three of them. If he receives a complaint about waste disposal, but he serves on the planning committee, he will approach a colleague on the relevant committee. Now, district councils will take up such matters with their colleagues who sit on the boards. Democracy will work in that way. The district councillors will be closer to the public. They will be more numerous, more approachable and will identify with the interests of their constituents far better than the metropolitan county councillor, who might represent 12,000 or 15,000 people spread over an often indefinable area.

I am astounded by the hypocrisy that I have heard in the debate. The Opposition are facing in every direction at the same time, in the hope that they will see someone with a different point of view with whom they can identify. The Government consulted the electorate in June 1983. Our proposals were clearly set out in the manifesto. We have been consistent in our approach — we have not faced in different directions. We are doing what we were elected to do. We are not saying one thing and doing another. Perhaps the Opposition will learn from our consistency. Perhaps that is why we are sitting here and they are sitting on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I very much enjoyed the fully-fledged concept of parliamentary democracy outlined by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), especially the idea that debate is irrelevant. He therefore chose not to make a speech of any importance, and I understand why. If he believes that the only principle that matters is that of the manifesto commitment, the process in which we are engaged becomes a waste of time. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that Conservative Members who rebelled last night are lesser Conservatives who should be cast out into the everlasting wilderness?

I want to deal with the serious subject of the county of Greater Manchester. We have the opportunity to develop a case that the Secretary of State must answer. We must know the specific reasons for the proposed abolition of the Greater Manchester county council. London hon. Members have spoken as though there were a great difference between Greater Manchester and Greater London, but they are very similar. There is a whole to the Manchester region — so much so that the Government recognised that, for example, when drawing up their recent travel-to-work areas. They overrode the district boundaries and recognised that people operate in considerably larger economic, social and planning units than those provided by the district councils.

The city of Manchester occupies an unfortunate role in the Manchester conurbation. It is virtually confined to the inner city area, so that it does not have access to the resource base which depends upon the conurbation. Those who have fled from the city base to areas such as Trafford should, according to the Government, not have to accept any responsibility for the city centre, upon which their very existence depends. That has a direct repercussion on conurbation services, such as the arts and the cultural activities that depend critically upon the centre of the conurbation.

Conservative Members say that we can go back to something which, in fact, never existed. When the county of Greater Manchester was formed, the highway programme would have taken more than £2,000 million to bring into practice and 150 years to bring into being—such was the confusion among the small local authorities. I believe that hon. Members would accept the fact that the necessary functions should be performed by country-wide structures, and that is why the Secretary of State accepts the existence of joint boards.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said that we are specifically discussing the representation of the joint boards. He took some time to explain the inherent difficulties involved with secondary elections. My hon. Friend touched on, but did not develop, the issue of the balance of parties. Although clause 32 provides for representation on the joint boards of minority parties from each district, it does not give control of the membership to those minority parties. The legislation allows the controlling group — for example, in the borough of Trafford — to decide the Labour members chosen to represent the Labour group and Labour voters. The legislation effectively sabotages the effectiveness of those joint boards. It is the spirit not of democracy but of the denial of democracy and denial of access of the public to its elected representatives — those who claim to make decisions in the name of the public. It is the spirit of patronage at large.

Like most hon. Members representing Greater Manchester constituencies, I have received no correspondence in favour of the Government's proposals. No Conservative Member from a Greater Manchester constituency has taken the trouble to put the case for the GMC's abolition. The nearest we come to a Conservative Member from that area is the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science—the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn)—who, I understand, comes from Eccles. That is much to his credit. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman is not in a position to talk about the merits or demerits of the case, because his brief is to stick rigidly to the issue of ILEA.

It is significant to note the strength of feeling among voluntary bodies and other organisations that have had access to the county councils. Those bodies are exclusively condemnatory of the proposals put forward by the Secretary of State. In recognising the conurbation of Greater Manchester, it is important that we provide a structure that allows for integrated planning and services. That integration allowed the city to produce projects such as the Manchester ship canal, which was designed 100 years ago with joint efforts by the various Manchester areas. No Mancunian—I was born technically in the former borough of Stretford—would consider himself to be other than a Mancunian. No Manchester United supporter, whose ground is outside the city of Manchester in Stretford in the borough of Trafford, would think of Manchester United as other than a Manchester football team. No Mancunian, whether from Bolton, Bury, or the other parts that make up Manchester, would consider the idea of breaking up Manchester to have any sense, especially when it will mean worse, not better services.

It was instructive to hear the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) say that he was unhappy about some of the joint boards. The structure of the joint boards has been criticised by the borough of Trafford, which the Secretary of State prays in aid of his proposal. The bodies that will be set up if the Bill is unamended have been criticised. People may favour the general principle of abolition, but they do not favour what the Secretary of State will put in place of the Greater Manchester council. That is why we deserve a more realistic debate about Greater Manchester.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Those hon. Members who were present when the debate was opened were treated to a vintage example of what I might call the "Lib labyrinth". The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), when seeking to prove that the Labour party was hopelessly inconsistent, divided and confused about its attitude to the abolition of the upper-tier authorities, was interrupted repeatedly by one Labour Member after another seeking to prove that the Liberal party was every bit as confused, contradictory and divided. For those hon. Members watching and listening, it was a remarkable performance.

There are two perfectly clear facts about the amendments moved last night and this afternoon by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. It is clear that, if last night's amendment had been carried, the GLC would have been taken out of clause 1, and thereafter in Committee the Bill would have been only about the abolition of the metropolitan county councils. The amendment moved this afternoon would have taken the metropolitan county councils out of the Bill, so that for the rest of the Committee stage the Bill would have been only about the GLC.

The amendments were clear. There was nothing strange or convoluted about them. The astonishing fact is that, considering the campaign that the Labour party has been waging in every one of these seven authorities at the ratepayers' expense, it has chosen to abstain on each of the amendments in turn. I cannot read it from here, but I think that the message on the badge worn by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) says "Keep the GLC working for London". Last night, the hon. Gentleman had a chance to go into the Lobby to vote for that slogan. It might have been called the "Keep the GLC working for London" amendment. The hon. Gentleman chose to sit where he was. This afternoon, the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), who represents a Merseyside constituency, and other hon. Members who represent constituencies in the met counties will have an opportunity to go through the Lobby in support of the amendment to take the proposal to abolish the met county councils from the Bill. They will do precisely what they did last night—they will stick where they are and not vote.

Mr. Robert M. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I shall just finish my sentence. I should be delighted to hear the hon. Gentleman's argument because I shall refer to it in a moment.

The message that is going out from this Committee is that when it comes to the crunch, to the most important clause of the Bill which we are taking on the Floor of the

[Mr. Jenkin]

House and the amendments that go right to the heart of the Bill, the Labour party cannot make up its mind whether it will vote for the amendment.

Mr. Wareing rose——

Mr. John Fraser rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I shall give way to the hon. Member for West Derby.

Mr. Wareing: Which of the major political parties in this Chamber has voted solidly the same way on every issue and has determined its policy the same way on every issue? I suggest that it is the party to which I belong.

Mr. Jenkin: I shall be interested to see whether the hon. Gentleman votes solidly in favour of the amendment removing the Merseyside county council from the Bill.

Even more interesting is the fact that, during the speech by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, three entirely different and inconsistent arguments were made about why the Labour party was abstaining. First, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who is not in his place, said that the Labour party did not vote for the amendment because it was ill drafted. What absolute poppycock. The entire line was to be taken out. The meaning was crystal clear, and any parliamentary draftsman would have been proud of the amendment.

We then heard a totally different answer from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West when he intervened. He said that the Labour party did not vote because the GLC did not want to be split from the metropolitan county councils. This is purely a matter of Labour party tactics. The local government campaign committee is trying to stick together. Hon. Members on both sides of the Committee know perfectly well that the arguments about the GLC and the metropolitan county councils are very different. The arguments of many metropolitan district Labour councillors differ totally from the arguments of councillors in the inner London boroughs. I acknowledge that fact.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Boyes: On a point of order, Mr. Dean. The Secretary of State has made what could be seen as a damaging statement about elected Labour representatives on district councils in metropolitan county areas. He should justify that.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Member is on a point of argument, not a point of order.

Mr. Jenkin: We have had three arguments. The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said that the Labour party was not voting against these crucial amendments which go to the heart of the Bill because the two amendments were contradictory. What rubbish. I think that the hon. Gentleman and I came into the House on the same day. We have been here now for 20 years. He knows that it is entirely in order for any hon. Member to table in succession a series of amendments. Each one is then voted on. The argument that the amendments might be inconsistent has never carried any weight. It is a good argument to say, "That amendment was defeated, so I shall now move this amendment."

It was an entirely legitimate tactic for the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey to have moved an amendment last night to take the GLC out of the Bill and then, when it was defeated, this afternoon to move an amendment to take out the metropolitan counties. The Labour party has sat tight on both. When it came to the crucial issue in the Bill, the Labour party did not put its votes where its mouth is and where the ratepayers' money has gone.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I am coming to the hon. Gentleman's speech. He made a good, closely argued speech. I shall be brief because I sense that the Committee wishes to reach a decision fairly soon.

We all know that the Liberal party is divided on this issue. The hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) have made it clear that they are in favour of abolishing the metropolitan county councils. The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) have made it clear that they wish to keep those authorities. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said that there was nothing inconsistent about that. They want to keep them until they can put something better in their place, so therefore two vote to keep them and two vote to get rid of them. As an example of tortuous logic, that just about takes the biscuit.

We are aware of the view of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). He was asked a clear question by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey)—whether the hon. Member for Copeland would give a pledge to restore the metropolitan counties. The hon. Member for Copeland said:

"Let me say absolutely unequivocally,"——

we waited——

"as was made clear at the Labour party conference a few weeks ago, that the Labour party is committed to preserving under democratic control the achievements and strategic functions in the management of local government services. That is quite specific—".—[Official Report, 3 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 40.]

I have read those words up and down and I can make neither head nor tail of them.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Jenkin: It is clear that the Labour party has consistently refused in the past few months to give any commitment to restore the metropolitan county councils.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) made an important and interesting speech. He made a number of points. He and the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) talked about unity of the Greater Manchester area which somehow justified this complicated and unconvincing system of two-tier government. With the benefit of experience, we believe that it is unconvincing. They said that Manchester is the focus for the towns around, and I do not doubt that. They mentioned the exchange, the arts and the railways. Are they seriously saying that those proud authorities—Bury, Rochdale, Oldham, Bolton and all the rest—are not conscious of being strong, all-purpose urban areas, many of which were previously county boroughs, which are anxious to have their powers back?

If hon. Members go round, as I have, and talk to the people in the town halls in those areas — not just members of the Conservative party—they will find that they cannot wait to get rid of the Greater Manchester council. The hon. Gentleman said that the public passionately wished to keep the Greater Manchester council. I do not know whether he is a keen reader of the Manchester Evening News. If he is, he would have seen on 1 December this year this article:

"A public debate on Government plans to scrap the Greater Manchester council with other metropolitan authorities was cancelled today through lack of interest. The all day event at Manchester University was to have featured leading politicians from GMC, Merseyside and the Greater London Council. Only seventeen people enrolled."

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Minister accept that last Friday night in Stockport town hall over 200 people turned up at a meeting organised by the Stockport council to hear hon. Members? About 90 per cent. of those people were appalled by what they heard about the Government's proposals.

Mr. Jenkin: The meeting that was organised to cover the whole subject attracted no attention. Those who are involved with local government services in those areas know, as my hon. Friends the Members for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) — the authentic voice of the west midlands — know, that those metropolitan counties have never caught on. They have never caught the public's imagination. The public do not understand the councils. They become confused by the division of functions, which are contradictory, confusing and give rise to conflict and delay.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northfield was asked, in an intervention, about the water authorities. I have news for the Committee. The Bill does not set up one authority that bears any resemblance to a water authority. There are only two new permanent boards. One is the London Planning Commission which is purely advisory and has no executive function. The other board that the Bill envisages is the trustee of the Merseyside museums. There is no other quango such as the water board. [Interruption.] I support the existence of the water boards. They are making themselves more efficient. However, I shall not listen to any view that suggests that the Bill is setting up any such authority.

A lot of nonsense has been talked about quangos and centralisation. This Bill deals with the devolution of power to the boroughs. The districts will have 100 per cent. of the service expenditure from the metropolitan county councils to run themselves or for joint expenditure and it will be under the control of elected borough councillors. That is the truth, and the argument from the Labour Benches that somehow we are creating a remote and unaccountable form of government is so much nonsense.

We have heard from the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish the argument for retention. From my hon. Friends the Members for Northfield and for Lancashire, West we have heard the argument for abolition. They spelt out the case very clearly, and there is not the slightest doubt that my hon. Friends had a considerable edge in that argument.

I urge the Committee to reject the amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. We shall watch with fascinated interest. Whether the amendment is obscure, badly drafted, contradictory or anything else, Labour Members will sit tight and abstain. It makes their position wholly incredible.

7 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I do not often find myself in substantial agreement with the Secretary of State, but I agree with him on one fundamental point. There is no inconsistency, no ambiguity, no lack of clarity and no complexity in the amendment. It would take out of the Bill the provision to abolish the metropolitan county councils.

The Government's proposals do not merely hand some power down to the districts; they take much power away from democratically elected bodies. That proposal is unacceptable and we shall vote against it.

If the Labour party chooses to make a decision today —as it did in the early hours of this morning on the GLC—to abstain, it will be abstaining on the simplest and most clearly stated proposal to remove the metropolitan counties from the Government's grasp in regard to abolition. The Labour party must take responsibility for that decision.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), whose amendment is part of the group that we are discussing, made a speech which, in its substance, was seeking to do what he accepts we are seeking to do—to make it clear that one cannot generalise, that there should be options, and that those options should be decided within the regions by the people concerned and not imposed.

As evidence of the fact that that has always been our approach, the hon. Gentleman will, I hope, recollect that yesterday we moved and debated amendment No. 35, which will be voted upon later tonight. That amendment would provide for local public inquiries to be held in each of the seven county areas producing impartial reports to be laid before Parliament, which would allow a better form of government to be implemented in each of the areas. It would be not a matter of imposition, but of proper consultation leading to proper and well-informed decisions.

As the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) rightly said, if this is not the place where we should debate issues on the basis of good information and accurate facts, and if we are here simply to rubber-stamp manifesto promises, that is a substantial change in the constitutional role of this place. I think that almost every hon. Member would find that change unacceptable.

Mr. Hind: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that he has changed his mind fundamentally from the statement in his party's manifesto, and that during the course of the debate he has not given us one solid or good reason why he and his party should have done so?

Mr. Hughes: I shall come in a moment to the speech of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind).

The amendment of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish is specifically related to the Greater Manchester council. I argued—and I stand by it—that the arguments in favour of the Greater London council being retained are stronger than those for the retention of the metropolitan counties, not least because the London county council came into existence in 1889, whereas the metropolitan councils came into existence only in 1974.

The arguments for retaining a metropolitan county in Greater Manchester are stronger than those in regard to some of the other metropolitan counties. To that extent also I may find myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. Clearly, that was the view of the Redcliffe-Maud commission, which reported to a Labour Government. It said that there should be three metropolitan counties—Merseyside, West Midlands and Greater Manchester. It said that Tyneside and West Yorkshire were, for differenct reasons, not appropriately metropolitan authorities—Tyneside because it was more suitable to be a unitary authority, and West Yorkshire because it could be satisfactorily divided between its five component authorities. We share that view. The Labour Government added West Yorkshire and South Hampshire to make five proposed metropolitan authorities. The Conservative Government were then elected into office, they produced a White Paper, they proposed having six counties, and they implemented that proposal.

That was the judgment of the Conservative party. It differed from that of the Labour party, which wanted five authorities, and from the Redcliffe-Maud commission, which wanted three. We say that each must be judged on its merits and that they should not be grouped together.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) I think misunderstands the nature of our proposal. We say that in general terms there is far too much government in Whitehall and that it should be devolved to the regions. There was some sympathy in the hon. Gentleman's remarks for that view, where we are talking about properly defined local government—and there is always a difficulty of definition—that should be at the lowest possible level. It does not exclude—a quotation was made from a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright)—parish or community councils, because they deal with very local matters and are not at the same tier of local government. There is no inconsistency in saying that central Government should be reduced and shorn of many of their inappropriate responsibilities, and that there should be regional government and unitary local government at a lower level. That is the proposal behind all the amendments to the Bill that we shall be moving.

We do not find any problems with those parts of the Bill which properly take powers away from a metropolitan county where they can properly go to a district. That is appropriate, and we have always supported that concept.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) made two points to which I should like to refer, although one of them is peripheral to the debate. He knows that my two colleagues and I will be regular attenders when the Bill is in Committee upstairs. We shall be supporting the continuation of the GLC, just as we sought to retain it in the early hours of this morning. At the same time, we shall be fighting for better proposals for the metropolitan counties.

There were three sittings of the Committee dealing with the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill. We supported the Government on the Second Reading of that Bill, and therefore did not have a great deal of criticism of it. I apologise to any hon. Members who feel aggrieved that because of previous commitments I was not able to be present at the sittings. One of those commitments was a meeting with the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. The appointment was made long before the date of the Committee was fixed. That was why I was not able to be present. When there is the possibility of more hon. Members from the alliance parties being on a Committee, the problem will not arise.

A proposal to get rid of the metropolitan counties and replace them by indirectly elected or non-elected authorities would lead to the fragmentation of local government. We shall fight as hard for a decent local government service for people in the metropolitan counties as we shall for those in London. Regional argument will be heard. That is why we shall move to a vote now. The Government's proposals for abolishing the metropolitan counties without proper consideration of their differences and problems should not be approved by this Committee or by the Committee upstairs.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Archie Hamilton and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Cowans: I beg to move amendment No. 29, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such date as the Secretary of State shall by order appoint not being before 1st April 1986, such order to be laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

It seems that the fighting Liberals could not muster as much support for their amendment as the Conservatives mustered against their own Bill, and proportionately that is a very good thing.

The amendment seeks to bring some sense to the Bill by deleting 1 April 1986 and making the Minister come back to the House to lay an order so that Parliament will be able to debate the matter. There are several fundamental issues underlying the amendment.

In far too much legislation powers are given to Secretaries of State who do not have to return to Parliament, so hon. Members have no opportunity to debate the matter. This Bill must be one of the worst as it gives the Secretary of State 40 or more powers to do things by order without any redress for Parliament.

I shall begin with the non-political aspect. Members of Parliament should not be persuaded to vote for a Bill which hands over the powers of the House of Commons to a Secretary of State, whoever he may be, because to do so would be to betray the people who sent us here. Every issue should be debatable. Jurisdiction should not be handed over to the Secretary of State. Unless the amendment is passed, we shall be creating exactly that situation.

This is a highly controversial Bill, even among Conservative Members, as yesterday's events showed. By a stroke of luck, the Government managed to get a majority of 23, but if they had been at all backward in certain other places they might well have lost by 23 votes. Either way, that proves how controversial the measure is. The Bill will be going into Standing Committee, but it is not only the Standing Committee that matters. When we have finished debating this nonsense, people outside in the real world will have to operate it. Therefore, it is essential that the widest possible consultation be undertaken. When that consultation has taken place, it is equally essential that the Minister should satisfy the House of Commons that that consultation was properly carried out.

When we debated the amendment calling for a Royal Commission the Government offered the farcical argument that everything had already been said and that there was no need for a Royal Commission. That flies in the face of the evidence, not just from the Opposition but from bodies such as the National Farmers Union, which I do not believe is closely associated with the Labour party. The NFU is extremely concerned.

Mr. Bermingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of the bodies to be abolished own considerable farming tracts and that tenants are extremely worried about the possibility of their farms being divided up between a number of authorities and the consequent danger to their livelihood?

Mr. Cowans: That is indeed one of the arguments for the amendment. So far, there has been no consultation. Unlike the Government, the NFU says:

"Many of the functions currently performed by the GLC and MCCs are of significance to the well being of agriculture within the metropolitan areas, and indeed in parts of the surrounding shire counties (notably strategic planning, mineral planning, land reclamation . . .) and to varying degrees the role of these authorities as agricultural landlords."

Unlike the Government, the NFU states that its job is to look after the people concerned and that the only way to protect the interests of its members is through the democratic processes of local government. The Bill removes those processes, so a little more muscle from the NFU might have changed yesterday's vote. The Government may care to consider that.

Mr. Boyes: It is interesting to note that our views have the support of many bodies that do not generally support the Labour party. In Newcastle, Mr. John Hunter, chief executive of the Tyne and Wear chamber of commerce, stated yesterday in The Journal:

"We feel particularly that economic development, which the County Council has always treated sympathetically, has not really been looked at in the Bill."

That is further damning evidence against the Government for bringing forward this shoddy Bill.

Mr. Cowans: I shall be coming to that. This is not a private debate. Anyone may join in. My hon. Friend may feel strongly enough about this to wish to go into the matter further later in the debate.

The Guardian also supports the need for consultation and for the Minister to come back to Parliament on this. On 23 November it said:

"It is impossible to read yesterday's local government bill"——

if it had gone no further than that, I should certainly have agreed entirely—

"which abolishes the GLC and its regional counterparts — without asking one question: What on earth is the point of it all?"

The Opposition would agree unanimously with that. It continues:

"The Government claims duplication will be avoided and a whole layer of local government will be removed and not replaced. Yet nearly all of the present activities—particularly at the GLC, the most publicised case—are not being removed, but merely dispersed: to central Government, to local authorities and to a Baker's dozen of quangos."

Those are not my remarks, but they are very true.

As has already been said, the National Consumer Council is also very concerned. Many words have flowed from the Secretary of State, but he has not convinced the National Consumer Council. The council states:

"This Council is, therefore, deeply concerned to note the fears being expressed by advice and information services in the Greater London and Metropolitan County areas over funding arrangements after the abolition of the second tier authorities in these areas. We are also perplexed"— they can join the club; we are all perplexed—

"because the government has indicated, on numerous occasions, that it is not its intention to damage the voluntary sector through its abolition proposals."

Even the voluntary sector does not believe that. I begin to wonder whether anyone believes the Government when they talk about the Bill. All those examples point to the need for consideration by Parliament.

7.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) raised an important point. This afternoon we received another grocery lesson on unemployment. The Government tell us vehemently—and I believe it — that they do not want to create unemployment. Yet here is a group of agencies that has done very well. Despite that, the Government are going to abolish the metropolitan counties with their job-creating functions.

A document prepared by Tyne and Wear points out that since the MCCs were formed in 1974 they have "helped to save or create at least 46,000 jobs, built hundreds of factory units and attracted millions of pounds of investment."

For their pains, the counties are to be abolished. Let there be no more crocodile tears about unemployment while the Government abolish a layer of government that has created 46,000 jobs.

There is another matter raised by Tyne and Wear which is also important to other areas. It is a matter to which little thought has been given. It has certainly not been discussed with the district councils that the Secretary of State claims are in favour of his proposals. Incidentally, it is remarkable that the Secretary of State cannot put a name to even one of those councils.

Section 137 of the Local Government Act gives power to raise a tuppeny rate and to spend it.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): And waste it.

Mr. Cowans: Waste it? I shall talk about waste in a moment. We will consider what the Government regard as waste.

The point is that £37 million a year is to be taken away from job-creating agencies. Consultation, as suggested in the amendment, is vital because no consideration has been given to the question of the district councils' money, while £37 million is to be taken away from the creation of employment.

We hear again and again that the Government are concerned about unemployment, but the Bill suggests to me that they are concerned more with creating rather than solving unemployment.

Mr. Park: On the question of consultation, is my hon. Friend aware that the first demands by the Government for staffing and financial information were issued to the county councils on 7 November, with a return date of 30 November? The Bill and the financial memorandum were published on 22 November. It is clear that the Government intended to go ahead, irrespective of what the county councils said.

Mr. Cowans: My hon. Friend strengthens the case for the amendment. The Government are trying to take a controversial Bill through the House at the speed of light without any consultation or consideration of either the services or the staff involved.

The Minister of State made a comment about waste. In Greater Manchester, 34,551 youngsters are on the dole. On Merseyside, 21,172 youngsters are on the dole. In South Yorkshire the figure is 22,199 and in Tyne and Wear, 40,000.

Mr. Boyes: And more every minute.

Mr. Cowans: Yes, indeed.

In Tyne and Wear, 20,000 jobs have been saved since 1974. That may not be many. However, when one considers how many jobs are lost every day because of the Government's policies, the removal of another job-creating function is nonsense and should be opposed.

We know that these measures are nonsense. We are trying to make the Secretary of State accountable to Parliament. We can do that only by carrying the amendment and preventing the Secretary of State from setting a date for abolition before we have looked at a single dot or comma of any of the clauses in the Bill. We want to oblige the Secretary of State to come back to the House of Commons and to lay before us an order that we can debate, so that we can at least satisfy ourselves that consultation has taken place.

There are any number of arguments that I could raise, but I know that many hon. Members wish to speak. However, I want to mention the fact that a considerable number of co-operatives in the metropolitan county council areas are funded by the county councils. There has been no consultation with those co-operatives. I have a letter from the co-operatives which draws attention to the fact that if the metropolitan counties are abolished they will have no funding at all. Another job-creating agency will be lost.

If there were no other arguments for the amendment, I could still refer to the derisory vote that the Government received last night, because they could not even convince their own colleagues that the Bill is a good thing. The Government may resist the amendment. If they do, it will be because they are frightened to bring their proposals back to the Floor of democracy in case, in the clear light of day, the 23 hon. Members who comprised their majority last night realise what is going on and change their minds.

The Opposition are not frightened of democracy. We want a debate on the Floor of the House of Commons. If the amendment is defeated, we shall conclude that the Government are frightened of democracy and increasingly frightened of their own Back Benchers, who know in their heart of hearts that the Bill is nonsense because it will destroy the Government and democracy.

Mr. Cartwright: I wish to support the amendment.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): The hon. Gentleman has not been here. He has only just arrived.

Mr. Cartwright: I have been in my place for the greater part of the debate. In view of the comment made by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), I wish to put that on the record.

I support the amendment, but for reasons slightly different from those advanced by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans). I support it because it removes the deadline of 1 April 1986, which is one of the problems involved in the Bill in its present form. The removal of that deadline would allow some sensible planning in connection with the changes that would be necessary if the Government got their way. More time would enable the Government to deal with some of the gaps that have already been identified in the provision for effective functions after abolition.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge drew attention to the anxieties of the NFU. Other organisations are also worried. On 6 December the Greater London Playing Fields Association set out its anxieties in a letter to several hon. Members. The association's committee consists of representatives of all Greater London boroughs and of sport and recreation in London, so it is a broadly-based body.

In its resolution the committee expressed

"very serious concern at the most damaging consequences to London sport and recreation, which will be caused if the Greater London Council, in its present form, is abolished without an effective alternative structure for sports management and finance being instituted."

The committee continued by urging the Secretary of State

"to establish a Committee of Enquiry with Terms of Reference which will allow a thorough process of consultation and examination to take place in the hope of safeguarding sport and recreation for the citizens of London."

More time is needed to tackle the problems of transition which will flow from the Bill—if it reaches the statute book. The Government have not seriously taken on board the complexities of setting up the joint boards to which they are so firmly committed. They will have to find offices for each of the joint boards and they will have to find chief officers. Staff will have to be assembled, and management systems will have to be introduced. In these days of reliance on computers, new computer systems will have to be brought in and made compatible with all of the organisations with which the joint boards will have to operate. Moreover, the joint boards, which will be composed of representatives of different local authorities, with different attitudes and political views, will have to produce a joint policy.

Under the Government's timetable, functions will stay with the abolished authorities until 31 March 1986, but the joint boards are to be set up on 1 September 1985. That implies a period of co-working. The joint boards and the soon-to-be-abolished authorities will be like a pantomine horse, and I cannot believe that there will be friendly and pleasant co-operation.

There will also be a problem of co-operation from the metropolitan districts and the London boroughs. Some have made it clear that they do not intend to co-operate. For example, the Association of London Authorities said firmly in a press statement of 22 November:

"We will not step in and take over from the GLC."

No doubt the Minister will say that the Association of London Authorities is not entirely impartial.

There might be something in that, so I was interested to see what the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives had to say on the matter, as that is an impartial body which has the type of expertise that will be needed to set up the joint boards and make them work. It said:

"This timetable seems over-ambitious even if the Bill receives Royal Assent in July, 1985 and whether or not the GLC and Metropolitan County Councils continue to refuse to have dealings with any matters which may contribute to implementing the Abolition Bill."

The society clearly envisages considerable difficulties. It summed up its views thus:

"It is highly unlikely in the light of the complicated functions which the joint boards are to be required to administer that they can be set up in such a short time to operate efficiently."

That is a strong argument for more time and for the Government to move away from the magic date of 1 April 1986.

7.45 pm

Much the same problem was foreseen by P. A. Management Consultants when it examined the metropolitan counties. It compared the change which the Government are now proposing with what happened between 1972 and 1974. Its report said that "there is now considerably less time than in 1972-74 to prepare for this reorganisation, and the problems inherent in fragmenting existing services are potentially greater than those involved in merging smaller units as happened in 1974 . . . our survey has shown that most Districts are unprepared to take on their new responsibilities."

That is another sound reason for not pressing ahead with this magic date.

Mr. Park: The hon. Gentleman will know from his experience of local government that the making of a rate is not treated lightly. Would he care to comment on the fact that there will be at least seven bodies with precepting powers and that, unless there is the prior consultation and agreement of which he has spoken, it would be quite easy for a local authority to have carefully arrived at a rate, only to have it knocked sideways by the seven precepts coming in at different times?

Mr. Cartwright: That is an important point. My experience is that it is sometimes difficult to deal with one precept coming from just one authority which might be controlled by colleagues of the same political party. Having several precepts coming from several directions from joint boards which might have quite different political make-ups is a recipe for considerable difficulties for local authority treasurers and chairmen of finance committees.

I was involved to some extent in the reorganisation of London's government 20-odd years ago. I recall our having a great deal more time to make the transition. The Bill was enacted in 1963, we had the first elections for the new authorities in the spring of 1964, the old and new authorities operated side-by-side for almost a year and the new authorities took over in the spring of 1965. That was a much simpler operation, as the London county council was transferring functions straight to the GLC, which covered a much wider area and had different functions, but at least had some basis on which to receive those responsibilities. Similarly, we had several metropolitan London authorities which were able to transfer their responsibilities and functions to the London borough councils. That was much simpler than what is proposed. A whole tier of elected government is to be scrapped and its powers are to be distributed among a complex spider's web of new bodies.

Part of this case has been accepted by the Government, because they might be preparing for the eventuality that they cannot abolish all these authorities or have new bodies in place by 1 April 1986. I notice that in clause 59 they take powers under which the Secretary of State may make an order giving the residuary bodies any of the functions which were previously performed by the GLC or the metropolitan counties. That seems to be a fail-safe device. If abolition is not completely achieved and the joint boards are not entirely in place, the residuary bodies will have to take over some of those responsibilities. The great flaw in that is that the residuary bodies will not be elected, but will be appointed by the Secretary of State and will therefore be subject to his detailed direction. If there is to be any delay, it would be far better to leave the existing elected authorities in place to carry out their responsibilities until replacement arrangements are established.

This rush is a recipe for high costs, chaos and confusion. It must have an impact on the services received by ordinary people. In its detailed discussions the Committee seems sometimes to forget that we are discussing not just distribution of responsibilities and the allocation of functions but the provision of important services on which many of our constituents depend. The rush to meet the target date poses grave risks to the quality of those services. That is another reason why I support the amendment.

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) made two strong and principled points. He said that it was wrong for the Government to fix a date before we looked at the detail of the Bill. That is manifestly correct. He also said that the House, at a later stage, should have the right to look at and approve the powers delegated to the Secretary of State. That was also right.

I wish to concentrate on a point that is peculiar to west Yorkshire and on a general point about the cost of the abolition of the metropolitan counties and the GLC. In the amendments that we discussed last night, we asked specifically for an inquiry into the cost. At that stage the Government found a sufficient number of supporters to go through the Lobby with some enthusiasm to defeat that batch of amendments.

I asked the Minister for Local Government to detail the savings, and wanted to know what proportion came from administration and what proportion arose from policy changes. I asked that because at one stage I suspect that he tried to obscure the issue. He pointed out that the metropolitan councils and the GLC were £432 million a year above target and £600 million a year above their grant-related expenditure assessments. Anyone who has taken any interest in local government finance will realise that those are not objective categories. They seem to have emerged from somewhere in the Department of the Environment and have eventually been produced in a form which only a few people can understand. However, they have no bearing on local circumstances and are of no relevance to local democracy.

Those were figures for what the Minister alleged to be the overspend in terms of the metropolitan counties and the GLC. However, he did not give the savings figure, and at this stage I wish to place on record my view that the Minister can no longer use the argument that the overspend will be the savings figure in relation to abolition—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the terms of the amendment, which questions whether a date should be specified in the Bill or introduced following a resolution of the House.

Mr. Fatchett: I make this point, Mr. Armstrong, because I believe that a resolution of the House is absolutely necessary. Were we to approve such a resolution, we would expect the Minister to produce accurate figures on which a judgment could be made rather than to advance the arguments that we heard last night, because those arguments obscured the issue by talking about overspend rather than potential savings.

I hope, Mr. Armstrong, that you will allow me to develop this point. I appreciate that your patience may well be tested. I would not wish to do that, because your reputation is that of a patient man and it would be wrong to push the point to any great extent. Last night the Minister said:

"There are substantial savings to be made from efficiencies, changes and the elimination of duplication and from the removal of a tier of unnecessary, costly and remote government".—[Official Report, 12 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1147.]

My point is that, even after the opportunity provided by last night's debate, the Minister did not spell out the figures. On that and on other occasions the Government have tried to accuse the metropolitan counties and the GLC of overspend and have then equated overspend with savings. Perhaps the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will take this further opportunity—which, Mr. Armstrong, you have provided by your chairmanship—to set out the details of the potential savings resulting from the abolition of the met counties and the GLC.

There is some doubt about what will happen to the functions currently performed by the West Yorkshire enterprise board. That board has been successful in its activities, it has saved jobs in both the short and the longer terms, and as a result of the section 137 2p rate it has spent about £6 million a year in the west Yorkshire economy. What will happen to that £6 million? Do the Government intend to reallocate the 2p rate to the districts? If so, the districts can perform those functions. If not, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge said earlier, we have reason to doubt the Government's sincerity about job creation and preservation. What will happen to this section 137 money? Do the Government intend to transfer it to the district councils? The Government, with eminent good sense, have just approved a scheme under which £770,000 will be provided for the small firms fund in west Yorkshire in 1985-86. Will they approve future expenditure, and how will that be made? Is it not indicative of the Government's inability to think ahead that they approve a small firms fund for 1985-86 but do not think about what will happen in 1986-87? It could be that future planning for those small firms will mean the difference between economic life and death.

I hope that the Minister will answer those detailed points and take this opportunity to outline the cost savings which the Government claim will flow from the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I apologise to the Committee for having missed the speech of the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) and part of the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). I also apologise if other pressing engagements mean that I shall not be present for part of the Minister's reply. I shall, however, read his comments carefully and perhaps follow up in the normal way. Given what I have just said, it would be wrong to test the patience of the Committee by making too long a contribution, and I shall therefore be as brief as possible.

There is a great attraction in the idea of not having the rigid date of 1 April 1986 for the abolition of the GLC. If hon. Members will permit me, I shall again refer to GLC matters which are of immediate concern to London Members rather than to wider issues affecting the existing authorities. Of equal attraction is the idea that an order should be laid before the House proposing a date no sooner than that fixed in the Bill. It could, of course, be later. That would give everyone, irrespective of one's view about what should succeed the GLC as the elected authority, the opportunity, at the same time as an appropriate inquiry into the functions of local government, of carrying through the process of dismantling the GLC.

I agree with the forceful arguments deployed by other hon. Members that more time is needed and that there is the danger of serious discontinuity, disruption and disorganisation if such a request is not conceded by the Government.

8 pm

An interesting study was undertaken by the Institute of Local Government Studies at the University of Birmingham, and a study by Flynn and Leach produced a short summary of the conclusions. Paragraph 4 of that report stated:

"Then we tackled the other major problem: would the Government's proposals actually work? Because if they won't there is no case for them. And there are grave risks in the 'wait and see, trust us' approach of the Government—there is too much at stake for that!"

The institute was commissioned

"to produce an independent research paper which could answer the fundamental question:—

> Can Joint Boards, Joint Committees and other joint arrangements provide an efficient and democratic local government service?"

Admittedly, this was before the Government's proposals, but the fear of "The shambles of 1986", as the report describes it, still remains.

I shall highlight some areas where there will be acute difficulties and disorganisation if there is too short a time period. There is great pressure for and common sense in having a longer period for these extremely complicated processes. The processes will cause unhappiness. A lot will depend on how long the Committee stage takes—that is the parliamentary factor.

The GLC employs 22,000 people. Incidentally, that is fewer than the Inner London education authority, which is often regarded as the smaller body. What will happen about the transfer of those people and the redundancy provisions? The Bill does not answer that clearly, but causes confusion. I see a tremendous minefield and an enormous area of potential chaos in the potential legal disputes which could arise from the distribution of property, assets, land and title deeds. There are miles and miles of files about those matters and, probably, about the existing semi-residual housing functions of the GLC, at county hall. There will be tremendous problems in dealing with them in a short time. There will be only a few months to get through the awkward, ragged transitional period when the new joint unelected institutions will take over those matters.

In a number of policy areas the Government have not yet concluded what should be done. In a broadcast at lunchtime today my right hon. Friend said that he was open to ideas and suggestions. That is encouraging in one way, but it reveals the degree of confusion in the minds of Ministers. What will happen if their Lordships decide to exercise their legitimate constitutional functions—at least, Conservative Members regard them as legitimate—and take much more time than my right hon. Friend expects them to take? There are many experts on local government organisation and structure in the other place, and they will need a great deal of time to consider the matter. It would not be right for the Government on a constitutional measure, which is also a conventional local government, so-called, reform measure, to hasten the other place, let alone hon. Members in Committee.

There are many other areas of potentially deep chaos among the boroughs, the Department of the Environment and the outgoing GLC structure when the GLC's functions are dispersed and, in some cases, devolved to local boroughs, although not most of them. There would be chaos in traffic management transitional provisions and in transitional provisions for detailed planning decisions. Most important in human terms, there would be long delay and chaos in the conveyancing of private properties, especially on the cancellation date of 1 April 1986. That would be a nightmare for people who try to convey private properties in London. That is a simple example, but it would affect millions of people.

Mr. Tony Banks: In support of the hon. Gentleman's case, may I say that he may be interested to know that there are still outstanding legal cases regarding property titles from the 1963 reorganisation.

Mr. Dykes: The hon. Gentleman's knowledge about that is greater than that of many hon. Members. He may have had experience on relevant GLC committees. That is a nerve-wracking element for the officials at county hall. They are not party political. Some officials have a political axe to grind, but if they are good they keep it to themselves. Officials are not merely worried but are genuinely anxious and almost verging on panic about that on behalf of the public they are supposed to serve. No sober bureaucrat or official enjoys chaos and upheaval, especially when it cannot be intrinsically justified. If the Government do not respond to the powerful admonitions of the Committee and seek to force through the reorganisation of local government functions in a gross period of eleven months and a net period of only a few months, they will find it extremely difficult.

The financial aspect also relates directly to the need for a longer period to do the monumentally complicated task of dismantling a body which a Conservative Government set up 20 years ago. On 24 November The Times stated that Mr. Livingstone's provocations and behaviour had given rise to abolition, but stated:

"The government's replies are equally unconvincing because they glibly assume the cost cutting enthusiasm of all borough and district politicians to be that of the Tory loyalists of Bromley and Trafford. The sums cannot indeed be done until the 1st April 1987 when the ratepayers of the conurbations first receive their bills under the new scheme. Even that will allow no full audit."

Can hon. Members imagine the chaos that would ensue? The article continues:

"it will take forensic accounting skill of the highest quality to trace through many Public Expenditure Survey lines the on-costs of the central government's own expanded responsibilities."

Since when have Conservative Administrations been in the business of wilfully causing so much confusion about matters which are already difficult to grasp, let alone in a period of total upheaval and disruption? The article continues:

"The system will be more opaque. For accountability we will have to trust not the untrustworthy, but easily identifiable, Mr. Livingstone but anonymous officials."

These anxieties are serious. They transcend the more superficial party political considerations and are the legitimate preoccupation of hon. Members during this political week. My hon. Friend the Minister is a serious and distinguished member of the Government. I hope that he will respond to the genuine anxieties that are being expressed here and elsewhere. More time is needed. More time would produce a much more rational solution, if only the Government would exercise more patience.

Mr. Tony Banks: Once again it falls to me to follow an excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). I only wish that more Conservative Members were present in the Chamber to hear him. Anything that Labour Members say about the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan counties——

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): There are no Conservative Members on the Back Benches, and only three on the Treasury Bench. The Chamber is empty on the Conservative side, except for the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes).

Mr. Banks: I was giving Conservative Members on the Front Bench the distinction of being described as hon. Members of the Conservative party. Indeed, the Back Benches are empty. That is symptomatic of the way in which the proposal is being taken through the Committee. Conservative Members have become so dispirited by Ministers, and by the lack of argument advanced by the thinness of the Government's case, that they prefer to seek refuge in the Tea Room to sitting through yet another embarrassing and, perhaps for many of them, boring evening discussing the future of the GLC and metropolitan county councils.

It is a great tragedy that such important matters should be discussed with no Conservative Back-Bench Member prepared to defend the Government's proposals. Their absence is an eloquent testimony to the Government's dreadfully weak case. One hopes, even at this late hour, that sanity will prevail and that the Government will back off from what for them, I hope, will be suicide. I do not wish to prevent them from committing suicide, but I want to prevent them from inflicting the chaos that their measures will bring to local government in London and the metropolitan counties.

I say that by way of aside. I wish that the hon. Member for Harrow, East were sitting on the Government Front Bench as a main Minister at the Department of the Environment; but he knows far too much and he is far too decent to be offered the job. The Government will ask only those who are prepared to support a lousy case to sit on their Front Bench.

Amendment No. 29 has been tabled to assist the Government. Why we should want to assist this pathetic, creepish Government, I have not the faintest idea, but we should at least try to prevent them from making fundamental errors. We shall assist them by pointing out the enormous gaps in their knowledge of the functions and purposes of the GLC and metropolitan county councils. I have selected two examples that reveal the Government's ignorance.

The first is that the Government say that the GLC does very little. They say that as the ambulance service, sewage services, housing management and London Transport have been removed from the GLC, there is no need for it to continue. What they do not say is that all those services were removed by central Government. If one chops off the legs of some poor devil and then says, "You cannot walk", it is hardly surprising. Those services were removed incorrectly , but even their removal does not make a case for abolition.

I apologise in advance to you, Mr. Armstrong, and to my colleagues, but certainly not to Conservative Members, for reading something into the record. I am sick and tired of listening to incoherent, incomprehensible and ill-informed speeches from Conservative Members, when they deign to be here, about the GLC not retaining enough functions to justify its continued existence. The GLC currently provides on a London-wide basis the following services: waste disposal; fire brigade; emergency planning; minerals policy; industry and employment; provision of services for the disabled; grant aid to the voluntary sector, including women's housing, ethnic, arts, transport, community and pension organisations; housing, including new build, mobility for tenants round London, hostels for the single homeless, improvements to rundown housing estates, help for housing associations and the creation of housing improvement areas. The GLC is the largest housing authority in the country, although one would not guess that from listening to Ministers.

The GLC also provides a London-wide arts and recreation policy, including the ownership and management of the south bank complex; judicial services; the strategic planning of London; traffic management; funding of advice services and the running of the welfare benefits campaign to help the poorest people of London; policies for women and ethnic minorities to counter discrimination against them; the protection of historic buildings and monuments; archaeology; the protection of the green belt; pollution control; building control; industrial training; provision of information technology for Londoners; the collection of London-wide statistics and intelligence; conservation and recycling; metropolitan roads; roads maintenance; the provision of facilities for pedestrians and cyclists; the provision of Thames piers, ferries, tunnels and bridges; and the London Record Office. They are GLC-provided, London wide services. Who says that the GLC retains no useful functions?

8.15 pm

Mr. Bermingham: To pick just one example from my hon. Friend's comprehensive list, how could the judicial services be devolved? If they are fragmented, perhaps someone will explain to me and to many other lawyers how that will relieve the already appalling waiting lists of cases in the London area.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) follows that intervention, he will be getting away from the amendment, which deals with the date and whether we should have a resolution before the House of Commons.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend's intervention illustrates another gap in the Government's knowledge of the functions of the GLC, which this amendments is designed to fill by giving the Government more time to think through their proposals. My hon. Friend answered his own question. Much as I should like to be enticed down that road, I shall take your advice, Mr. Armstrong, and proceed down another.

The second area of Government ignorance relates to the services that they say will be devolved from the GLC to the boroughs. Statistics have varied, according to the Minister who has been speaking at the Dispatch Box—the quality of Ministers at the Department of the Environment varies widely — so the figure ranges between 75 per cent. and 95 per cent. No doubt before long we shall be told that the London boroughs will get 120 per cent. of the GLC's services. However, the most recently used figure was 95 per cent., which is completely wrong. The Government say that the GLC's net current expenditure for 1984-85 is £530 million. Of that, they say that £396 million—or 74 per cent.—will go to the boroughs. The Under-Secretary of State said that in reply to a written question from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 3 December 1984.

The Government's first error is to underestimate the GLC's net current expenditure, which is $950 million. Ministers have no doubt excluded debt charges of £153 million — [Interruption.] I did not catch what the Minister said, but if he said that they should not be included he should bear in mind the fact that debt charges must be met from rates and block grant and, therefore, must be included in current expenditure. It would appear from my calculations that the Government have also excluded contributions to the housing revenue account of £114 million, and they have undoubtedly excluded the GLC's current revenue support to London Regional Transport of £177 million.

The Government's figure of £396 million undoubtedly includes many items of expenditure that will not go to the boroughs. Expenditure on roads will go to the Department of Transport. They have not yet decided what to do with Thamesmead. The provision for historic buildings will not go to the boroughs. The facilities of the Sports Council will go elsewhere. The expenditure for the Arts Council will not go to the boroughs—and we should not forget the expenditure on the shire counties. Those items represent about £60 million of the GLC's net current expenditure, and the Government have included them in the sum that they say will go to the boroughs. It is just not true. I know that I am taxing the patience of my colleagues with these figures, but I do so because we can use them again during the latter stages of the Committee. Unless the Government refute those figures one by one, we can only claim that they are accurate.

I have asked the Greater London council for an analysis of the 1984-85 net expenditure by the proposed successor authority. I should like to read this into the record. The Secretary of State is to receive £3·3 million of the GLC's net current expenditure. That represents 0·3 per cent. London Regional Transport is to receive £177·6 million, which is 18·7 per cent. The fire services board is to receive £143·3 million, which is 15·1 per cent. The waste disposal board will receive £65·8 million, which represents 6·9 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The Thames water authority will receive £31·8 million, which is 3·3 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The London Planning Commission will receive £1·3 million, which is 0·1 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The Thamesmead trust will receive £16 million, which is 1·7 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The Historic Buildings Commission is to receive £4·6 million, which is 0·5 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The Lea Valley regional park authority will receive £4·5 million, which is 0·5 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The residuary body will receive £174 million, which is 17·9 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The Sports Council—if, indeed, it takes over the GLC's sports grants programme—will receive £8·4 million, which is 0·9 per cent. of GLC expenditure.

[Mr. Banks]

If it took over the whole of the GLC's arts expenditure, the Arts Council would be responsible for £11·1 million, which is 1·2 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The city of London, acting as agent for the boroughs, would receive £2·4 million, which is 0·3 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The ILEA, taking over former GLC services, would receive £1·4 million, which is 0·1 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The shire counties and shire districts together would be responsible for £4·7 million, which is 0·5 per cent. of GLC expenditure.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman is anxious to get his remarks written into the record, but I find great difficulty in relating them to the amendment. The hon. Gentleman must come back to the amendment.

Mr. Banks: I tried to make the point at the beginning that the Government are clearly misleading the country and Parliament. The Government have great gaps in their knowledge. If they were to accept the amendment, we should be given a sufficient opportunity to consider the Government's case. We should have before us facts which will enable both Houses of Parliament to come to a proper and fit conclusion, I realise that this is tedious, particularly for the Government, because they are being given statistics which are truthful as opposed to statistics which they have manipulated.

You will be delighted to know, Mr. Armstrong, that if I am allowed another two or three minutes, I shall conclude my contribution. The boroughs will receive £293·8 million, which is 30·9 per cent. of GLC expenditure. The successor authority, undecided, will receive £10·3 million, which is 1·1 per cent. of GLC expenditure. That makes GLC net current expenditure a grand total of £950 million. It means that the boroughs would not receive 75 per cent., or 95 per cent., or whatever other figure the Government claim of the GLC's net current expenditure. The boroughs would receive 30·9 per cent. of the GLC's net current expenditure.

If the Government were to accept the offer to submit all their figures to an independent audit, the GLC would fully co-operate in making sure that the people of this country and Members of Parliament know who really is speaking the truth. The House of Commons and the other place would then be able to make a decision based upon true facts. I have read them into the record. I shall refer to them again during later stages of our proceedings. Unless the Government refute those figures, they will stand as the case put forward by the Labour party. They show that we have nothing to hide and that the abolition of the GLC will be to the detriment of London government. It will cost London ratepayers a great deal of money, about which, as yet, they know nothing. At least I have now put the record straight.

Mr. Stuart Holland: It is probably known to everybody in the Chamber, apart from the Secretary of State, that the target date for abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan councils is April Fool's Day 1986. Whether the Secretary of State cares to make a fool of himself in public is his business. Whether or not he cares to make a fool of the House is our business. We need amendment No. 29, which obliges the Secretary of State to bring an order back to the House for approval, since 1 April 1986 is far too early to deal with the range of unresolved contradictions in the Government's proposal.

I appreciate that the analysis of PA Management Consultants has been cited extensively, but we have not yet had the response of the Government to the main points that it makes. On the multiplicity of joint bodies rather than a unitary authority, the Government claim that they will "co-operate closely". PA Management Consultants say that this is an "unsound basis for an effective, lasting structure"

and that it fails in particular to take account of the current political and financial circumstances of local government. That has been well illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who cited in detail the costs which are likely to be incurred by the abolition of the GLC.

Turning to the conflict between services, the Government claim that "abolition will remove a source of conflict and tension."

By contrast, PA Management Consultants claim:

"The existing structure provides for the resolution of the inevitable conflicts"— it is important to stress this—

"between different services and between different areas of the metropolitan county".

That is quite apart from the uncertainty of the proposals to which I shall refer later.

A further reason for the amendment is precisely to resolve the cost issues. The Coopers and Lybrand report stresses the kinds of differences which are likely to occur from a high level of co-operation with the Government's proposals and from limited co-operation with them. We are talking about disparities of between £100 million and £150 million on the transitional costs and, on jobs and job savings, of between 1,000 and 1,500 jobs potentially at risk. Until recently the Secretary of State provided no figures, even at this stage of the Bill, other than the citing of something which was produced recently by certain London boroughs. In Committee upstairs, I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the Committee will wish to scrutinise those figures.

On the present basis, the Government appear to be thinking of a number, doubling it for Labour administrations, subtracting the number one first thought of if it is a Tory council and exiting with a self-fulfilling prophecy. These are the kinds of mathematics which not only would not convince the House, but would hardly convince any candidate who was trying for CSE mathematics. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West has already made that point in detail and substance. The House deserves a reply to these questions.

There is the further matter of the unresolved problems which will be caused for voluntary organisations. The Prime Minister has said many times in the House that she lauds and supports voluntary initiative, yet in areas which are directly relevant to a constituency such as mine and also of general relevance to other constituencies the Government have brought forward no adequate proposals —the single homeless, a problem which the House will consider tomorrow in more detail, problems such as drug abuse, alcohol misuse, ethnic minorities and their special problems, disability, advice and counselling services, the elderly, young people, women, community work, environment, special needs. We are talking of tens of millions of pounds. Because of the manner in which the Government have sought to introduce a major piece of legislation, it does not appear that the House can be assured that if the Bill is guillotined—and there is every indication that the Government will seek to guillotine it — these questions will be answered. Therefore, the amendment is essential to ensure that the House has a proper chance to express its views and to scrutinise the expenditure implications of the Bill and the wider implications for local and central democracy.

The Government choose to say that the GLC's housing responsibilities have been transferred to the local boroughs and that the GLC will shortly have no housing responsibilities whatsoever. I regard that as tragic. So do many of my constituents. It means the end of a strategic housing role for London. The example provided by the ending of the strategic housing role will be repeated in the other areas of expenditure and in other GLC functions to which my hon. Friends have referred. The abolition of the GLC's strategic housing role has slammed the door on many people in the inner city, who realise that inter-borough nominations are a farce. When they come to our advice surgeries, we cannot guarantee that they will have any chance of moving to other areas of London.

8.30 pm

As for the proposed transport quango, Lord Denning, a judge and not an economist, is able to comment on what is a profitable operation for London Transport. It is not clear that a judge, any more than any of the quangos which the Government seek to introduce by the Bill, is qualified to assess the externalities or cost benefits of a low-fares policy. If local people cannot vote for a cheap fares policy, that is a derogation of the democratic principle. It is crucial that, in seeking to render public spending accountable, the House should be able to press for the cost savings that occur when lower fares result in more use of public transport and more revenue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) referred to the employment implications of abolishing the role of enterprise boards, such as the West Midlands and Greater London enterprise boards. Uncertainty introduced by the Bill over the future of those boards will be critical for companies' economic prosperity. We have known for decades of the impending euthanasia of the entrepreneur. Now we are to see the execution of the employment prospects in many small firms because of the unqualified nature of the Bill. Unless the amendment is accepted, so that the matter can be seriously reviewed, there will be no chance of the future of those firms being ascertained.

The Bill is not simply seeking to amend recent legislation. The fact that it is a fundamental Bill is not illustrated only by the fact that the GLC and its forebears have been in existence for nearly a century. The underlying reality is that every Administration — Conservative, Liberal and Labour—for more than 100 years have sought to govern, in essence, by consensus and by gaining support. They have sought to gain that support by debate, discussion and argument and by motions and orders in the House.

It is striking that, in seeking to end argument and opposition from the metropolitan authorities and the GLC, the Government are spinning back the wheel, not merely past Labour Administrations and the Labour GLC, but beyond Joseph Chamberlain and the commitment to municipal government, municipal public works, municipal and civic pride and the right to local democracy, which was one of the bases of the rise and extension of popular support for the Conservative party.

Those facts will gradually be realised by the country, and they will certainly be realised if the amendment is not accepted. Without the amendment, there will be no way of avoiding the arbitrary ending of the public right to choice and the public right both to agree and disagree with central Government. There will be an end to the mechanism of consent on which democracy itself has been based for so long.

Mr. Bermingham: I shall be brief, because I wish to save most of my comments for the next group of amendments.

Let me ask the Government one simple question: When will they ever learn? The London county council was abolished in 1964 and we are still trying to sort out the legal problems that were caused because the then Conservative Government did not give the matter proper thought. When we transferred to the present system of local government in 1973, a number of problems arose over farmland. I shall give the Secretary of State a simple example. Farms often cross the boundaries of district councils which may be in the political control of different parties with different agricultural policies. What happens to the tenant farmer when he has two landlords with different policies? Disputes can end up at the Lands Tribunal and elsewhere.

If the Government are not prepared to learn from the mistakes made in the 1960s and 1970s and are not willing to give the proposals in the Bill time to work or to come back to the House and explain how matters have been sorted out, they are even more foolish and stupid than I thought.

The amendment gives the Secretary of State the chance to do it properly. We do not like what he is doing, but if he insists on doing it he should at least try to get it right. As I shall point out on the next set of amendments, the Government are setting a minefield of legal problems for themselves, for local government and for electors. That need not happen. All that is required is some constructive thought by the Government instead of an arrogant, doctrinal insistence on pushing through the proposals as quickly as possible because they believe that they have a divine right to do that.

The amendment is sensible and attempts to prevent some of the potential damage that the Government seem set on causing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): One of the main criticisms of the Bill on Second Reading was that it gave too much power to Ministers to do things by order. It was implied that more detail should be written into the Bill to remove that discretion. Therefore, I am surprised to see that one of the first amendments proposed by the Opposition seeks to do exactly what they have criticised us for doing. It will take something specific out of the Bill and give the Secretary of State power to lay an order to vary the date. I see some inconsistency in the Opposition's approach.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) said that there was a need for consultation. I agree with him, although there is nothing in the amendment about consultation. We should like there to be consultation, and

[Sir George Young]

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will use his influence with his colleagues on the councils concerned to ensure that they start consulting and end their ridiculous boycott against the Government and the successor bodies. We could then get the details that we need and ensure that the transition is a smooth one. I agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about the need for consultation and co-operation.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) implied that there would not be enough time for the joint authorities to be established before they took over responsibilities in 1986. The new joint authorities will formally be in place from September 1985 if, as we hope, we get the consent of Parliament. They will have adequate time to prepare their budgets for 1986. There is nothing to prevent the borough and district members who make up those authorities from meeting earlier to give preliminary thought to their needs.

The executive parts of the new authorities will not be radically altered at the moment of transfer. The services will be provided over the same geographical area as at present and there should be no difficulty in ensuring the continuity of operation of those services.

The hon. Member for Woolwich, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and other hon. Members claimed that there would be chaos. I should like to quote the chief executive of one of the district councils involved in abolition, Mr. Gordon Moore, chief executive of Bradford metropolitan district council. An article in Municipal Journal on 7 December stated:

"'I have no fear there is going to be total chaos', said Mr. Moore. The one thing about the Bradford style of management was that a freedom would be given to its officers, when the chips were down, to get on and do the best they could.

'The prime concern of mine is for the community I serve; they will not tolerate a mess-up on 1 April 1986, if that is the great day, and nor should they.

'They are not interested in all this non-talking, non co-operation at all . . . I know who is going to be blamed if things go wrong; the politicians will have a very short memory about instructing their officers not to co-operate—it will be muggins and his colleagues who get their backsides kicked for not getting it organised'."

It is the Gordon Moores who will have to operate the policy. They are the chief executives of the successor bodies, and I am confident that once the Bill is on the statute book they will make the policies work.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The hon. Gentleman can hardly claim to be making an argument from one unrepresentative sample. However, if that is the view of the kind of person who may well be on the unelected authority, how are they to be made accountable? Politicians are made accountable by the vote and can have their backsides kicked, but that will not be the case with the quango substitute.

Sir George Young: I was quoting not from a councillor but from one of the chief executives of a successor body. This person makes the point that it is the senseless attitude of a number of Labour councillors in not talking that has made them the culprits, and not the Government, who are giving adequate time to get the policy through.

The hon. Member for Woolwich then made a comparison with 1963-65, and I beg to disagree with what he said. He states that this reorganisation will be more complex than that of the early 1960s, but he is wrong. In the early 1960s, we were establishing the GLC from the LCC and some of the home counties and at the same time establishing the London boroughs. We were setting up two new tiers. This reorganisation is different. We are eliminating a tier and passing the bulk of responsibilities down to existing successor bodies. This will be a more simple reorganisation than the ones to which the hon. Gentleman referred. For that reason, we do not need the same amount of time as may have been necessary in the early 1960s. I think that the hon. Member will discover when we reach clause 59 that the residuary bodies cannot be used in the way that he anticipates, as a sort of legislative long stop if by any chance it is not possible to implement in 1986. We shall deal with that point later.

In an intervention, it was implied that there would be seven precepts in the metropolitan counties. That is not the case. There will be three new precepts—police, fire and public transport. I do not see any difficulty in the districts handling these precepts as they handle the existing precepts in their rates.

The hon. Members for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) spoke at some length about costs, but I do not propose to go into great detail about costs, because you said, Mr. Armstrong, that this was not the appropriate amendment on which to talk about costs. However, I noted that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West included, as part of the responsibility of the GLC, expenditure on London transport when the GLC no longer has responsibility for London transport. If this is the sort of statistic that he proposes to use, he will come unstuck. I am grateful to him for putting on the record his perception of the costs. When we reach part VIII, which deals with the financial considerations, that will be the time for a sensible debate about the financial consequences and where responsibility for the various policies will lie.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am as acutely aware as the hon. Gentleman—perhaps even more so—that the GLC no longer has the responsibility for London transport. That responsibility was taken away from the GLC to make the Government's weak case a little better. We know the political reasons, but the Minister cannot avoid the fact that the GLC has to give about £177 million this year in support of London transport. What will happen to the £177 million? Who will be responsible for it?

Sir George Young: The debate is on what percentage of the GLC's service will devolve to the boroughs in 1986. By then the GLC will have no responsibility for London transport. It will not be paying any money towards it at all. It is a red herring for the hon. Member to produce in the context of this debate a figure that includes the costs of London transport.

The hon. Member for Leeds, Central raised a number of questions. I shall deal with the position of voluntary organisations when we reach clause 46. He asked about applications for expenditure by the existing metropolitan counties that will take place in 1985-86. If the applications are sent to the Department, we shall process them in the normal way.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West also weakened his case by referring to housing, and said that the GLC is the largest housing authority in the country. He knows that in July of next year, before abolition, most of the housing stock will pass to Tower Hamlets and that simple statistic that he is so fond of using will no longer be relevant.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) implied that the Government had relied on estimates by four London boroughs for their estimates of saving. I hope that he has seen the parliamentary question, asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), which my right hon. Friend answered some two weeks ago and which gave quantifications of the Government's estimate of savings. His speech implied that he had not seen that answer.

The transfer of functions can best take place on 1 April in any year to simplify the adjustment to the rate support grant and the budgeting of the successor authorities. We have set out, firmly and clearly, that the transition should be in 1986. We made this clear in the White Paper in 1983, two and a half years before abolition is due to take place. The whole of our preparations, including the timing and introduction of this Bill, are directed towards that date, and there is no argument for delaying the change. There will be adequate time to make all the necessary arrangements.

The amendment would inject uncertainties that would be damaging to abolition. Perhaps that is why Labour Members wish the amendment to be in the Bill. It is best that the clause should set a fixed date and thus eliminate the uncertainty that would be introduced by the amendment. That is the way in which these matters have been handled in the past. Clear dates were given in both 1963 and 1972. To say that it is unprecedented is rubbish.

We have recognised, in the interests of the staff, that they need a clear view of their place in the future structure. We have taken what steps we can by setting up a staff commission and issuing a paper on all aspects of the transfer of staff. To make the date of the transfer variable would lead to damaging uncertainty. I urge the Committee to reject the amendment.

8.45 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts: I shall be watching to see how the alliance votes on this amendment, having witnessed on the last amendment that three of its members who represent cities in the metropolitan areas failed to support the alliance amendment to exclude the metropolitan areas from abolition. We are interested to see how it will muster its troops to make effective the transition from metropolitan and GLC government to this new system.

The hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) apologised for having to leave before the end of the debate. He referred to the Opposition's attitude to the House of Lords and intimated that the Bill might be mutilated by the other place in the way that the interim provisions Bill was mutilated. I have heard rumours that, on the advice of the Secretary of State for Education and Science, if that happens the Prime Minister will create 1,000 new peers and abolish the House of Commons. We wait to see whether that rumour will be fulfilled.

The proposal in this amendment is to stop the abolition of the county councils and the GLC being tied to a specific date. It would be sensible, in the light of everything that has happened and is happening, and in the light of criticism from Conservative Members and everybody outside who has looked objectively at these proposals, for the Government to accept an amendment that releases the abolition proposals from being tied to a specific date, and allows all the interim arrangements and provisions to be made before abolition takes place.

As many of my hon. Friends, and the hon. Member for Harrow, East, have said, the amendment will assist the Government in their aims. We wish to protect the citizens of the metropolitan areas and the GLC from the chaos that will arise as a result of this legislation being rushed through while tied to the proposed date. Despite what the Minister said, we believe that our amendment will check the powers delegated to the Secretary of State. Even though we ask that the Secretary of State be allowed to come back some time after April 1986 to present an order to implement the proposals, we are not giving the power to the Secretary of State but vesting it back in both Houses of Parliament. The amendment would kill the enabling nature of the legislation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) said, it is amazing how often the Bill delegates power to the Secretary of State. We want to ensure that the House of Commons and the other place have a say in what happens, and that is the purpose of the amendment.

The amendment also ensures that all the difficulties and doubts about the administration and handover — which we believe will result in chaos—can be dealt with. The Minister talked about co-operation and consensus. But there has not been any co-operation, and there will not be any as far as this Bill's proposals are concerned. That is the making not of the Labour-controlled authorities involved but of the Government, because there was no inquiry, investigation or adequate public debate before the proposals were announced. That prevented consensus in the first place. We are trying to rescue the Government from a situation of their own making by allowing a period of time to elapse after the passing of the Bill so that that consensus can be created through consultation and, perhaps, amendments to the proposals that might make them acceptable.

I must repeat something that I said yesterday. Ministers, and the few supporters that they have mustered on their Back Benches for this provision, keep talking as though they are abolishing two-tier local government and handing power back to the London boroughs and metropolitan districts. But they are doing nothing of the kind. They are setting up quangos and joint boards and producing arrangements, with statutory backing, that require action in co-operation across local authority boundaries. We shall have Conservative and Labour-controlled local authorities, and—heaven forbid—one where the Liberals hold the balance of power, being forced by statute to co-operate. If that is not a recipe for disaster, I do not know what is. The amendment would allow time for that to be thought out.

The Minister weeps crocodile tears about the problems of the staff working for the metropolitan counties and the GLC, but they are in favour of the amendment and have been advising us and the Tory rebels in support of this amendment. They want this leeway so that their problems can be taken care of. They are not asking for a fixed date. They want time for things to be worked out properly on their behalf, as well as on behalf of the people in their areas whom they are employed to serve.

The amendment will enable the Government to kill the accusation that savings will not come from changes in policy and cuts in services by proving—in the interim, and before the order is laid before Parliament for final abolition—that they have made savings in administration. If their case is justifiable, they will accept the amendment and demonstrate that point before they abolish the metropolitan counties and the GLC.

The amendment will allow Parliament to remain sacrosanct in the light of inadequate inquiry. It will also help to settle the anxieties of the voluntary organisations prior to abolition. Whatever the Minister may say about clause 46 and the discussions that will take place, and whatever the Secretary of State said yesterday about the voluntary sector being satisfied, the opposite is true. The Government have not satisfied the voluntary movement in the GLC and metropolitan areas that they will safeguard voluntary services after abolition.

The Government are looking to individual borough and district councils to fund directly grants to voluntary organisations. The National Council for Voluntary Organisations has already been in touch with borough and district councils in the areas threatened with abolition, but only one in eight has been able to predict with any confidence that it will be able to fulfil the majority of its new responsibilities towards local voluntary organisations.

Furthermore, the Government suggest that £5 million a year for four years after 1986-87 is sufficient to ease transitional problems following abolition. Of that total, 75 per cent., or £3·75 million, will be directly funded by the Government. So far, that is the only central Government money being made available to replace the £60 million now being spent by the GLC and the metropolitan councils. The Government have said that they want borough and district councils in the metropolitan and GLC areas to take part in collective funding schemes to cope with projects that operate across several borough and district areas. Under those proposed collective arrangements, the councils would have to reach a two thirds majority before agreeing to approve funding of voluntary organisations.

If the Minister and his friends want to allay fears of voluntary organisations, they will need an interim period in which to prove that the funding will be there and in which the anxieties of many of the voluntary groups, which now fear that they will not be funded, are satisfied. If the Government vote down the amendment, they will rue the day they did. The amendment will save them from the chaos that they will otherwise create. Incidentally, I know Mr. Gordon Moore of Bradford, but he is not a chief executive of all the successor authorities and I do not think that he is qualified to say that there will not be any chaos. There will be other successor authorities in his area, and not all of them will be democratically elected. However, the Government will rue the day that they vote down this amendment, because their proposals are a recipe for chaos and disaster. They are also a recipe for Tory unpopularity throughout the metropolitan and GLC areas. It is with altruism that we commend the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Archie Hamilton and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Straw: I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1986' and add '1987'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 38, in page 1, line 15, at end add 'or such later date as is provided for by sub-section (3) below.

(3) The abolition date shall be such date as the Secretary of State may by order appoint after he has received from each authority or body established under this Act a report upon their capacity to carry out functions of the Greater London Council or of a metropolitan county council which it is proposed to transfer to them under this Act and he has published such reports.'

Mr. Straw: A few minutes ago my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was commenting on something that I have observed—that the parade of the Tellers tells us something about the social composition of Britain. Conservative Tellers are always taller than Labour Tellers.

Mr. Tony Banks: It was the welfare milk.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend says that it was due to welfare milk. There was milk for the Conservative Tellers even before welfare milk was available to Labour Tellers, because they could afford it. That sociological fact—the linking of social class to height—was confirmed by a recent report from the Department of Health and Social Security. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) says that he is only 5 ft 5 in. That proves the point that there are some odd genetic groups, such as that to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West belongs. I was saying that the report published earlier this week by the Department of Health and Social Security shows the direct correlation between social class and height.

Amendment No. 36 extends by one year the abolition date referred to in the Bill. Amendment No. 38, an alternative amendment, states:

"The abolition date shall be such date as the Secretary of State may by order appoint after he has received from each authority or body established under this Act a report upon their capacity to carry out functions of the Greater London Council or of a metropolitan county council which it is proposed to transfer to them under this Act and he has published such reports."

You may confirm, Mr. Dean, that, although we discussed amendment No. 46 in a group yesterday, it will be voted upon after this group, so it may be for the convenience at least of my hon. Friends if I remind them of the content of amendment No. 46. It ensures that if the precepting authorities go ahead, there are direct elections to them rather than just indirect elections. As I fancy that there will be no clause stand part debate, I should like to make it clear beyond peradventure that we are opposed to the abolition of both the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

Last night the Government suffered a serious setback. They have a majority over the Labour party of 190 and over all other parties, including Irish Members, who, as far as I know, were not here to vote in great numbers, of 141. For the Government to have their majority reduced to 23 was, as my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, a moral defeat and a major humiliation. There is no question about that. The Government have an enormous majority, with all the dangers to the future of the Conservative party that the former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), so sagely warned about during the election. In any other Parliament that would have been an arithmetical defeat, and the proposal would have been abandoned.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that the vote last night was not only a comment on this proposal, but perhaps was more a Conservative party comment on the present style of leadership of the party?

Mr. Straw: Of course my hon. Friend is right. I would not say that he was always right, but he is almost always right—99 per cent. of the time.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): And the headmistress has had Tory Members in since then.

Mr. Straw: Indeed. But even in the best-run schools, such as Eton and Winchester, there were riots in the last century, and what happened then can happen again.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that as one Conservative Back Bencher is in the Chamber it would be decent to mention him?

Mr. Straw: I would mention him, but I am afraid to say that, not having seen him all that often, I do not know who he is. If the Secretary of State would care to tell me his name, of course I shall mention him.

Mr. John Major (Huntingdon): He is the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield).

Mr. Straw: I should like to say to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) that last night—I shall not embarrass the Minister by mentioning names—when a Tory Member was speaking from the Back Benches, The Times guide, Vacher and Dod were all in use on the Treasury Bench as Tory Members tried to match up the photographs to the names, without success.

Mr. Flannery: Another one has come in.

Mr. Straw: Yes, indeed, and at the Bar of the House we now see the Back Bencher of the year—the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who fully deserves that appellation for his persistent criticism of the Government. We look forward to his and his hon. Friend's support on this amendment.

Yesterday the Government suffered a major moral and near arithmetical defeat. The Secretary of State for the Environment was interviewed on the radio this morning about that defeat. My hon. Friends should savour the following extract from the Press Association tape. Under the headline,

"Jenkin's open mind on London authority",

it reads:

"Environment Secretary Patrik"—

the spelling suggests that the Press Association may think that he is a Russian—

"Jenkin said today he would keep 'an open mind' over calls by fellow Conservatives for a new directly-elected authority for London to replace the GLC."

This, however, is a bit much:

"But he told Tory critics of his abolition Bill that they must make a more 'coherent' case over what functions such a body would have.

His remarks came after the Government scraped home last night by just 23 votes to beat off an amendment to the abolition Bill tabled by ten senior Conservative backbenchers.

Speaking on BBC radio, Mr. Jenkin played down the scale of the revolt over the amendment, which called for a new London authority.

He said: 'I certainly do not agree that it was a near defeat'."

How much closer do we have to make it before he will admit a near defeat?

The one consistent feature of the Secretary of State's record in the past 15 years has been the way in which he sticks to his principles and convictions with great passion right up to the moment when he changes them. He was absolutely passionate in his defence of the abolition not only of the GLC and its elections but of the transfer of political power without elections until he was defeated, at which point he became equally passionate in defence of the present arrangement.

Seeing defeat about to hit him in the face once again, he has now said that despite all his passion he has "an open mind" about this. We shall take him at his word as he is a man of his word. I also take it that his open mind includes that of his right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government. Given that openness of mind, it must surely be sensible to delay implementation of the Bill at least until 1987 or, better still, as our alternative amendment proposes, until there has been the fullest possible consideration of a report from the metropolitan counties and the GLC.

Above all other motives, we are concerned for the political health of the Secretary of State and the Minister. I hope that they will listen to our counsel, advice and solicitation and accept the amendments in the spirit in which they have been put forward.

Mr. Boyes: It could be described as absurd, but I prefer to call it arrogant, for the Government to determine and print in the Bill a date for abolition of the metropolitan counties and the GLC before the Committee even sat. Even worse, the Bill has not yet been to the House of Lords. Important changes were made to the paving legislation when it reached the House of Lords and I am sure that there will be changes in this Bill. That does not give me any great pleasure, as I believe that changes should be made by this House, where Members are elected and accountable and the full flow of democracy can operate.

I am concerned not so much about the way in which the Government have treated the House of Commons as about the way in which they are treating the people who live in the metropolitan counties and in the GLC area. However, the Government's behaviour is not inconsistent. Earlier in the year there was the paving Bill. That was another example of unprecedented action by the present Government in passing a Bill to stop elections to a body before that body had been abolished. All that we are seeing is a continuation of the same attitude on the part of the Government to the people of Tyne and Wear, for example, and all the other areas concerned.

9.30 pm

A few moments ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred to the small majority that the Government had last night. I consider that last night was a resigning matter for some Ministers. However, if they will not go that far, they must recognise that the vote certainly did not give them a mandate to abolish Tyne and Wear county council on 1 April 1986.

I should also like to mention the haste with which the Bill is being passed through the House and with which the set date is being approached. I was elected to a district council in 1973. In 1973, because there was to be a local government reorganisation in 1974, there were two authorities running parallel—a shadow authority and the new authority. Coopers and Lyband, who have been studying this problem, have said that

"The problems of transition are substantial."

The problems were substantial in 1973, too. When the reorganisation finally took place, the shadow authorities had been in existence for approximately 18 months, and there had been a full year before the effective date of the reorganisation. I remember that period well. There was a great deal of confusion. There were many problems. Nevertheless, the Government believe that they can achieve a massive transformation from the elected metropolitan county councils and the GLC in not much more than six or seven months.

Furthermore, the Government have no right to carry out the abolition on the date they suggest, because they have no mandate to do so. Last night, we discussed the question of abolishing the authorities without an inquiry. In fact, there has not been——

Mr. Fatchett: There is no point in putting the case. The Minister has gone away.

Mr. Boyes: I note my hon. Friend's comments. The Government Front Bench seems to be leaving the sinking ship, as well as the Back Benchers. There does not seem to be much heart either on the Government Back Bench or on the Front Benches where the Bill is concerned. No doubt the new Minister would rather have had to deal with something more progressive.

Mr. Straw: I must explain to my hon. Friend that the Minister for Local Government was absent on my account. I asked to have a word with him at the back of the Chair.

Mr. Boyes: I understand what my hon. Friend says, but I understand that there is a big team of Ministers at the Department of the Environment. The Minister does not seem to be very well supported by his colleagues at the moment. If I was a Minister who was trying to push through a Bill such as this, I would not be sitting on the Front Bench—I would be hiding in the Tea Room.

Although there has been no official inquiry, there have been tests of whether people want abolition. First, the Government invited responses to their White Paper in a short time. It is interesting that those responses and the analysis of them have not yet been published or put in the Library for us to examine. The Government have let us know, however, that the response was approximately 10 to one against abolition. Secondly, we have the evidence of several opinion polls. They are quite independent and have not been carried out by the Labour party. I should like to remind the Government of the results. In April 1984, an opinion poll was taken in a significant constituency —that of the Prime Minister. One would imagine that if any area favours abolition, it is Finchley. However, 66 per cent. of those polled opposed abolition and only 15 per cent. favoured it. It might be argued that that result is slightly skewed so we should examine the views of those who said that they would vote Conservative. Of them, 40 per cent. opposed abolition and 35 per cent. favoured it. On that basis, the Government have no mandate to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

More recent opinion polls appeared in The Observer and The Sunday Times. I should be ashamed to be a Minister who was pushing such an unpopular measure through. It is unpopular throughout the country, not just in metropolitan county areas or in the GLC area. Indeed, the Government are using a crushing majority to push through a measure that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said was included in the Tory manifesto without much stomach from leading members of the Conservative party.

The Sunday Times MORI poll found that 46 per cent. of those polled opposed abolition and that only 30 per cent. favoured it. A Harris poll for The Observer conducted in the Enfield, Southgate constituency, where there is a by-election today, found that 47 per cent. disagreed with the proposal and that only 31 per cent. approved of it. We can ask for a delay in abolition only until the Bill has been considered in Committee upstairs and by another place.

The area covered by Tyne and Wear metropolitan county council, of which I am a representative, has one of the highest levels of unemployment in Britain. The council is one of the bastions against the Government's policies and is trying to offset the terrible economic and social problems which have been caused by the Government. It is disgraceful that it is to be abolished. Do not take my word for it. I shall conclude with some quotations of people who might not be expected to take the same view as me. The Tyne and Wear Chamber of Commerce and Industry has said:

"The Tyne and Wear County Councils spent £4·6 million on economic development in 1982-83. It has had a high profile and considerable success in its activities and the Chamber has been happy to work with it in this field."

I have received several letters from companies in the Tyne and Wear area which are appalled at what the Government are proposing to do. I shall quote just one, which was sent by the chairman and managing director of Ronson (International) Limited. He wrote:

"We strongly urge the Government to reconsider their decision as it could well reverse the trend towards encouraging investment in the various development areas in England".

On any criteria, the Government have no right to abolish the county councils on the date specified in the Bill. They have an obligation to cancel that date until further and fuller consultation has been carried out. This measure does not have the support of the elected representatives in the areas affected, the people in those areas or many of the businesses in those areas. It is a disgrace and outrage that the Government are using their majority to trample on the people whom I represent.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Is is sad that the Chamber is not as packed as it was this time last night, because the amendments we are discussing are of constituency interest. As a result of the timing of the Bill, we are left with a hotchpotch. It is one of the most bungled pieces of legislation that I have ever seen. Residuary powers affecting all our constituents are to be transferred to joint arrangements between the boroughs, and support for services is to be cut. I doubt whether the Government will be able to implement their proposals in the time limit which they have set.

Most hon. Members represent inner cities, but I hope that my hon. Friends from the metropolitan county areas will forgive me if, naturally, my remarks relate mainly to my own area. In the past, the services enjoyed by my constituents have been provided by mutual arrangement. For example, racialism runs throughout the whole of the London areas, but when Brixton and Toxteth went up in flames my area did not merely because of the initiative taken by the black community to set up a co-operative project. That was successful because the GLC gave £500,000 and the Department of the Environment £600,000. Further money was provided by Europe and the local boroughs. Such projects should be a beacon for the integration of people of different coloured skins into our communities.

We do not know whether the Government will be able to sort out such a problem within the timescale they have set. I could list 44 other organisations that have benefited from urban aid, not to mention a number of other services in which the GLC has made a tremendous input. For example, the Brent Association for the Disabled and a number of other organisations have in the last year received £800,000 from the GLC. How will the necessary bridging arrangements be made if the GLC is abolished on the date specified in the Bill? The Government's timetable will make it impossible to implement such arrangements.

The Bill is a hotchpotch. It is ill-thought-out and ill-conceived. It contains no planning or strategy, makes no economic sense and will not lead to efficiency. As a result of the date specified, the muddle which will follow will be just as bad as the muddle which preceded it.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): My comments centre on amendment No. 38, which calls for the authorities which will take over the GLC's responsibilities to submit a report on their ability to do so. I also wish to highlight the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt).

Many of the projects in my area of south London have been developed to cope with the kind of social problems that are encountered here. We have set up advice centres for youngsters, training centres for the unemployed and drug advice centres because of the financial back-up we have received from the GLC. Only recently we debated the effects of drugs in our society, and we were told that the Government had such concern for this problem that three Government Departments would form a committee to see what Government help, along with local authority help, could be given to those areas in which drugs are now a problem.

We are entitled to told by the Minister how the services will continue to exist. The Minister has repeatedly told us that if the Bill becomes law there will be savings. No one believes that. Even allowing for possible savings, we have never been told by a Minister, who has replied to a debate or who has made a statement at a meeting about the abolition of the GLC or metropolitan authorities, that existing services will no longer exist after abolition. I have already mentioned services which exist and which are crucially important in my constituency. Many hon. Members who represent areas which will be affected by the proposals could also do so. If the Minister believes that local councils will be prepared to continue and develop such services, he is living in dreamland.

9.45 pm

Together with my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I was a member of the Committee which dealt with the London Regional Transport Bill. We were given clear assurances that services such as the dial-a-ride service for disabled people would continue. It has brought great benefit to people in London. When we asked the Minister about it, he said, "Have no fear. We shall do everything in our power to see that these services continue and are extended". Yet Wandsworth council is doing everything it can to avoid a commitment to continue dial-a-ride services for the disabled.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Local authorities have been innovative, broken into new areas of deprivation and considered the plight of black communities. Because local authorities have been able to minimise the excesses of the Government, the Government are attacking local authorities. Is not that at the heart of the Government's proposals?

Mr. Cox: Unlike the remarks from Conservative Members, what my hon. Friend says is true. It is because of the Government's policies that the services needed—I could list any number—have not been developed. Local authorities such as mine have willingly followed Government instructions and made cuts. The services continue only where authorities are prepared to stand up to those instructions and provide them. That is at the heart of the Bill. Neither the Minister nor the Secretary of State has given a commitment that on-going services will continue and be developed.

At present the Wandsworth Disablement Association has applied for money for a survey about access for disabled people, but the local authority has rejected it. If Conservative Members believe that, under the Government or with Tory-controlleed authorities, there would be no development of the services about which we have been talking this evening—the dial-a-ride service, help for the young unemployed and help for victims of drug abuse—they should hang their heads in shame. That is what Members of Parliament were elected to fight for.

Not only Members of Parliament, but many outside organisations are saying that to the Government. Many hon. Members will have received letters from organisations such as the London Cycling Campaign, the National Consumer Council and the National Council for Voluntary Organisations. Those organisations are not politically affiliated, but they know that the services that they try to provide are under threat. However, they have received no assurances from the Government as to their future.

The Secretary of State says that the Government's proposals will produce savings. We do not believe that for one moment. The Minister has an obligation to discover what will be the attitude of the local authorities which take over the services presently provided by the GLC or the metropolitan county councils. If the Minister does not do that, it will prove, as my hon. Friends have said, that this is a shoddy Bill that has not been properly thought out. If not enough Conservative Members oppose it here, let us hope that enough Conservative and other peers in another place will give the Government their just deserts and reject the Bill completely. In view of all the opinion polls and the statements of Londoners and people from other metropolitan authorities, the Government should realise that they have no mandate, as many Conservative Members have told Ministers, for the destruction of services that are vital to so many communities.

Mr. Wareing: Yesterday we talked about the need for an inquiry and covered much of the ground then. However, I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the first sign of the Bill was in the Queen's Speech on 22 June 1983. If it receives Royal Assent in mid-1985, we shall have been debating the issue for two years. The matter will have been worth two years of argument. Yet, within nine months of Royal Assent, the local authorities in the metropolitan areas must be completely reorganised. The period is insufficient, especially as there has been no inquiry.

The local authorities which will be required to take over the services have a right to tell the Government whether they can manage them. Clause 44 refers to museums being transferred to metropolitan districts, but there is no mention of art galleries. What will happen to the Walker art gallery in Liverpool, which is a national asset? What will happen to Croxteth hall in Croxteth country park? The Bill mentions the South Bank complex and museums and institutions in the London area but not in Liverpool.

If I were Liverpool city council, which will again be affected by the rate-capping diktat of the gauleiters of Marsham street, I would be inclined to say, as the council has already said about St. George's hall, that we cannot afford to keep open the Philharmonic hall, Croxteth hall or Speke hall. The Secretary of State must tell the people of Merseyside what will happen to those assets.

Tourism is hardly mentioned in the Bill, yet the Liverpool city council, under the Liberals and Sir Trevor Jones, gave up tourism. Jobs would have been lost at the Lime street tourist office, Liverpool, had it not been for the economic development committee of Merseyside county council, under my chairmanship. If Liverpool is to be asked to take over the responsibility for tourism, we can forget about it. Liverpool does not have sufficient resources with which to deal with the vast housing and education problems and the social services difficulties.

Merseyside is proud of its record on tourism and economic development. It is proud of its record in creating jobs. Each year it sponsors the Merseyside river festival. It created the Tall Ships race which coincided with the international garden festival. Merseyside is proud of its ferry services. It has expanded all of its tourist services in order to allow the people of Liverpool and people from other parts of the world to enjoy the international garden festival. All that will go for a naught if the Government get their way and attempt precipitously to implement the Bill in 1986.

If the Government have any sense and want to make anything of the morass that they are creating, it must be an organised morass. To do that, they must take longer. Even if the Bill receives Royal Assent in June or July of 1985, it will be impracticable to implement it in detail by the spring of 1986. If the Government try to implement the Bill as rapidly as they say they wish to implement it, the municipal enterprise which areas like Merseyside and the west midlands have shown in the past five or six years will be set at naught. They will destroy the hopes of the people in those areas.

Mr. Bermingham: I ask the Secretary of State to look carefully at paragraph 15 of schedule 8, which deals with trading standards. It contains no provision to transfer the right to prosecute from the outgoing authority to the authority which is to take over responsibility for trading standards. It is very important that we should not get into the mess that we got into in the past when we created new authorities in place of the old ones.

I ask the Secretary of State to look also at a number of the legal functions of the county councils. I ask him to consider the problems involved in the transfer of property and in civil litigation involving local authorities, or on behalf of local authorities, which are to go out of existence. The morass that will be created will be colossal. It would not cost anything to devote a little time to this problem, and by doing that a great deal of expense, hardship and misery could be prevented. If the Bill is to be passed, it ought to be passed in as orderly and efficient a manner as possible. That will take time.

There is an old saying that politicians can decree, but that human beings have to undertake and carry out what has been decreed. It is imperative that the mistakes of 1964 and 1972 are not repeated. If they are repeated, they will create a great deal of work for lawyers. Lawyers welcome the creation of work, but that would not be in the interests of the electors. They are the people to whom the Government ultimately will be accountable. The electors of this country, the electors in the metropolitan areas, in the City of London and in the GLC will hold the Government accountable for the waste that they will cause by trying to hurry through an ill-conceived and ill-thought-out Bill.

Mr. Corbyn: I speak tonight on behalf of my constituency and also as an hon. Member who is sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees. I want to place on record the disgraceful way in which all the trade unions were treated over consultation. Before the Bill was introduced, no substantive replies were received to the letters which were sent to the Government about abolition.

The effects of abolishing an authority in one year will be devastating. Anyone who had anything to do with the creation of the metropolitan counties or the GLC knows that there are still staffing arguments going back to the pre-1964 period. There are still protected conditions for former employees of the Middlesex county council who now work for the GLC. The same sort of problems exist in the metropolitan counties.

If the Government are saying to an organisation that employs 21,000 people that it must cease to exist within the year, the effect of the loss of jobs on the economy of London——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Local Government Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Major.]

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Corbyn: The effect on staff of the devastation of the GLC and the metropolitan counties will be profound. There are still problems from the 1964 reorganisation and from the transfer of housing functions in 1982.

The Government's offer of a staff commission, which will not protect the interests of the staff, but will act as an agency for the Secretary of State in destroying jobs and creating more unemployment, must be strongly opposed.

The Secretary of State has the temerity to say that he is not getting co-operation from the trade unions. I ask him to think back. There has been no consultation with the trade unions, but we have had from the Secretary of State a high-handed refusal even to offer the same sums as his predecessor offered on the transfer of housing in 1982. Yet the Secretary of State complains that the trade unions are unco-operative.

The Government just managed to win a vote yesterday. Any other Government who lost so many votes in a Division would have resigned. From now on, the abolition procedures will be met with the strongest possible resistance by those employed in the metropolitan counties who are not prepared to see jobs and services destroyed.

The Government are not even prepared to say how much abolition will cost in terms of lost services, unemployment benefit, redundancy pay and other crucial matters. Yet they have the temerity to attack people who have given their working lives to the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

Some people at county hall can remember the present Secretary of State for Education and Science visiting them in 1963 and telling them that London county council employees had nothing to fear from the establishment of the GLC and that it would provide continuity of employment. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to talk to employees who have been at county hall for 40 years or more and say, "Your future is secure. You can pick up your redundancy cheque in six months' time?" That is all that the Government are prepared to offer to people who have given good service for so long to London and the metropolitan counties.

The Government may try to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties in six months, but I predict that they will not succeed, because of the opposition throughout London, the opposition of individual workers and trade unions in those authorities and the opposition that will be mounted in this House and in another place. From now on, it is downhill for the Government as they try to destroy democracy and so many of the things that democracy in London and the metropolitan counties has provided.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): Only fleetingly have the amendments under discussion been touched on in the past three quarters of an hour, and I am not in the least surprised about that, because on two amendments the Labour party has not voted when opportunities have been provided for it to vote to keep the GLC and the metropolitan counties. On those two crucial amendments, they abstained.

We have made it clear from the outset that we intend the abolition of these authorities to take place on 1 April 1986. This was stated in the White Paper and the Bill has been introduced, as promised, early in this Session in line with the timetable that we proposed.

The hon. Members for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) and for Tooting (Mr. Cox) have argued that more time is needed to put our plans into effect, but I do not agree. The boroughs and districts are already fully functioning local authorities—this contrasts with the situation in 1963-65 and 1972-74 when all the successor bodies were new authorities created by the Bill. Thus, the bodies taking over most of the tasks of the GLC and MCCs are in place and can begin planning for the transfer from an early stage. The fact that some of them are not doing so at the moment is regrettable, but I am sure that all authorities will be able to make adequate preparations for the changeover.

The new joint authorities will be formally in place from September 1985, with adequate time to prepare their budgets for 1986. Again, there is nothing to prevent the borough and district members who make up those authorities from meeting at an earlier stage to give preliminary thought to their needs.

Labour Members are proposing amendments that would introduce unnecessary delay and increase uncertainty for the staff concerned. The GLC and the MCCs would no doubt continue their obstructionist behaviour. If they were given another year to live, we should have to submit to yet another year's advertising from Mr. Livingstone, and another £10 million or ratepayers' money being wasted. My hon. Friends would not accept that. The timetable that was set out is workable, so I ask my hon. Friends to reject these amendments.

Amendment proposed: No. 46, in page 1, line 15, at end add—

'(3) On the abolition date there shall be established for each metropolitan county and for Greater London a body corporate to be known by the name of that county with the addition of he words "Precepting Authority" or to be known as the Greater London Precepting Authority, as the case may be.

(4) The authorities established by subsection (3) above shall consist of members elected by the local government electors of the metropolitan county or Greater London, as the case may be, in accordance with this Act and the Representation of the People Act 1983.

(5) The authorities established by subsection (3) above may in respect of any financial year, or part year, beginning with the abolition date issue precepts to the appropriate rating authority for the levying of rates to meet, to the extent the authority considers reasonable in all the circumstances, the expenditure of the bodies or persons or joint committees (other than directly elected bodies) to whom functions are transferred by this Act.'. —[Mr. Straw.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Bill (clause 1) reported without amendment; to lie upon the Table.

Mrs. Mundiya (Ombudsman's Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

10.32 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The report by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration — the ombudsman — into a complaint that I submitted on behalf of my constituent, Mrs. Yasmin Mundiya of Bradford, in July last year, published at the end of last month, is extremely critical of senior officers in the immigration service and senior Home Office officials. The ombudsman concluded:

> "As my investigation has shown, there were a number of deficiencies in the Home Office's handling of this affair and their overall performance fell far short of what sound administration requires. I was particularly dismayed by their evident unwillingness to acknowledge that a mistake had been made and by their apparent lack of concern for Mrs. Mundiya."

The ombudsman added:

> "I cannot of course quantify what damage has been caused to Mrs. Mundiya's reputation in the community in which she lives by the Home Office's error in wrongly stating in correspondence with a Member of Parliament that they had originally regarded her marriage as one of convenience. I am prepared to accept, however, that the reporting of this fact by the local press will have caused her and her family distress and that nothing short of an apology by the Home Office will put the record straight and remedy the injustice which she has sustained. I am glad to say that the Principal Officer of the Department, through me, offers his apologies to Mrs. Mundiya, both for the distress caused by their error and for the inordinate delay in replying to her letter of 8 October 1982."

Anyone familiar with the language normally used by the ombudsman will recognise that his strictures in this report are unusually severe, and no fair-minded person would be surprised by that, for what we are concerned with in this report is not some inconsequential clerical or administrative error. It is a case where, when the grounds on which the immigration service was proposing to deport Mrs. Mundiya's husband from the United Kingdom were crumbling, under pressure of representations from outside, senior immigration officers and Home Office officials sought to conceal and cover up their failure to sustain the grounds on which they had sought to deport him by claiming, quite wrongly, that Mrs. Mundiya's marriage was a marriage of convenience.

That deliberate falsehood was inserted in a draft letter from the then Minister of State at the Home Office to send to the then Member of Parliament for Bradford, West. Inevitably, the falsehood was publicised in the local press, causing Mrs. Mundiya deep personal embarrassment and distress following the predictable reaction of many in her own community who had been led to believe, quite deliberately, that Mrs. Mundiya had sought to have her husband removed by saying that her marriage was a marriage of convenience.

Mrs. Mundiya wrote to the Home Office asking for an explanation in October 1982. Mr. Chris Brion, an immigration officer at Hull, aware of the falsity of the claim publicised by the local media in Bradford, asked his superiors for an explanation to be given to Mrs. Mundiya. A second immigration officer, Mr. John Scott, also based in Hull, who came into contact with Mrs. Mundiya quite independently, also asked his superiors for an explanation to be given to Mrs. Mundiya. All those requests were to no avail. Mr. Brion was even told that it was inappropriate for the local newspaper reports to be corrected, and, so that he got the message, he was firmly reminded that the immigration service rule book forbids immigration officers from talking to the media.

Mr. Brion is a very experienced immigration officer —he has been in the immigration service for 15 years. During the time he was pressing his superiors for Mrs. Mundiya to be told why her marriage had been described by a Minister as a marriage of convenience, Mr. Brion was requested to transfer from Hull to Dover, despite having serious domestic circumstances making such a transfer exceptionally unwelcome, and, despite the fact that transfer by immigration officers, unsolicited, and over such a distance, is most unusual. Prior to the requested transfer, both Mr. Brion and Mr. Scott had been removed from inquiry work, and when Mr. Brion failed to report to Dover, as instructed, he was dismissed. Mr. Scott has since resigned from the immigration service.

In a letter to me, published on the day that the ombudsman's report was made available, Mr. Brion said:

"The PCA's report shows that the official responsible for the first false statement in the Mudiya case was the Chief Inspector in charge of the Immigration Service. On receiving a forensic report he decided that the original case against Mr. Mundiya could not be maintained; but because he was conducting a political feud against the Bradford Law Centre, and did not want them to be able to claim a victory, he recommended Mr. Mundiya's removal on different and very questionable grounds. It was when this suggestion was rejected by B3 Division of the Home Office that he invented the story of a 'marriage of convenience' to rationalise Mr. Mundiya's detention.

When Mr. Scott and I pressed him to tell the truth he manufactured counter allegations to coerce us into keeping quiet and to discredit us . . .

In an interview which I tape recorded the Chief Inspector's deputy"—

Mr. Peter Saunders, now retired—

"admitted that the action taken against me was in consequence of my wanting the deception exposed. He also admitted that lying to Members of Parliament is a Home Office tactic:

'On the file it says quite clearly it was a mistake . . . now it's quite a different matter to go back to the MP and say, "Dear Mr. ——, we've made a terrible mistake, sorry." You try and fudge it a bit to get away with it. If we could get away with not admitting we'd made a mistake then so much the better.'"

The ombudsman's report reveals disturbing information about the attitudes and behaviour of senior immigration service and Home Office officials. I should like to quote from another letter that I have received since the ombudsman's report was published, from Mr. John Scott. He says:

"Finally, the Ombudsman's report indicates that there are serious things wrong with the way in which the Immigration Service is being run, by people who are prepared to subvert their powers to suppress embarrassing material, to put junior officers in fear of doing their duty, and to persuade senior ones to change their minds to suit their demands. The distress which such malpractices can cause to innocent members of the public is incalculable."

It is clear from the report, the correspondence and other information that I have received that the conduct of immigration policy is seen by senior officials of the immigration service and Home Office officials as a political battleground where those who represent and support those facing removal and deportation are seen as political enemies to be defeated.

The Home Office also receives political intelligence from the special branch. I quote from the report of a special branch sergeant, Home Office file reference M394273/2 Mundiya, to an acting inspector at Hull immigration office. It says:

"Just a few of the many cuttings that have been appearing in the Bradford Telegraph and Argus Newspapers. These have been appearing at an alarming rate in recent weeks and there is little doubt that there is a concerted effort by the Bradford Asian Youth Movement (left Wing), other left Wing Groups, Tim Whitfield (Senior Community Relations Officer) (left Winger and John Salmon (Reporter) to overthrow the Home Office's policy on Deportations and Removals.

I wouldn't be surprised if the money being used for the campaign is being given from Bradford Community Relations Council's Funds. I was in their office on Monday and the whole wall was covered in literature condemning Deportations and Removals. A lot of money is being spent on the campaign.

I was thinking of sending copies down to Peter Tompkins"— chief inspector of the immigration service—

"just for his information but you can do it if you think it advisable. I have enclosed two copies of each. There have been others, but I think these are the most significant."

As it was a Home Office Minister who claimed that the marriage of my constituent was a marriage of convenience, equity dictates that the Home Secretary and not the permanent secretary should apologise to my constituent.

The Minister should give clear assurances today that the calculated, premeditated damage done to Mrs. Mundiya will be done to no one else and that in the future when the Home Office makes mistakes senior officers will not be permitted to cover up those mistakes by deception.

The public are also entitled to expect that public servants in the Home Office, including immigration officers, will not in future be subjected to victimisation and coercion. Mr. Brion must be reinstated and allowed to put his case to an independent inquiry. Both he and Mr. Scott have been denied the opportunity to put their case at disciplinary hearings within their service. That is the minimum that is owed to Mr. Brion, and I regret that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary were unable to agree to my request some time ago to defer Mr. Brion's transfer until the ombudsman's report was published, notwithstanding the statutory restrictions preventing the ombudsman from inquiring into personnel matters.

There is hardly a black or Asian family in my constituency which does not have a complaint about how it or a relative or friend has been dealt with under the United Kingdom immigration and nationality laws, which are fundamentally racist and sexist. Every family has a member who has experienced problems with the immigration laws, rules and procedures, which they know are deliberately designed to exclude as many black and Asian people from Britain as possible, whether they come for settlement, as dependent relatives, for marriage, for study or just to visit.

When the immigration service and the Home Office deceive, conceal, manipulate and cover up laws, rules and procedures which are already deliberately designed to exclude people on the basis of colour and sex, outrage is compounded. And when the immigration service and the Home Office are caught in the act of deceiving, concealing, manipulating and covering up, as the ombudsman's report makes so vividly clear, all hopes of building a multi-racial Britain with good and progressive community relations are seriously damaged.

The fears, the suspicions, and the resentment that burns in the black and Asian community in Bradford and throughout Britain about the barriers put in the way of black and Asian people coming to this country will intensify so long as they have no reasonable expectation that the present unjust, racist and sexist immigration and nationality laws can be swept away democratically and so long as those charged with administering the present laws, rules and procedures blatantly act in a highly political way to ensure that political victories are won at whatever price against people like my constituent, Mrs. Yasmin Mundiya.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) is absolutely right to raise on the Floor of the House the matter of the report of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, although his speech had, in the event, very little to do with it. Any complaint of maladministration must be taken seriously, and when a complaint is upheld by the Parliamentary Commissioner it is certainly the duty of the Department concerned to do all that it can to prevent a repetition of what occurred.

There are one or two things that must be made absolutely plain, in view of the hon. Gentleman's speech, lest anyone should be misled into believing that what happened in this case is an indictment of immigration control, let alone the control operated since the Conservative Government came into office in 1979. It should be quite apparent from the facts that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—I am glad that he is in the Chamber—was at best careless in his language, and at worst somewhat disingenuous, when, the other day, he talked of what had happened as having stemmed

"from policies laid down by Ministers—policies which many of us regard as racist." [Official Report, 29 November 1984; Vol. 68 c. 1118.]

The events described could not, of course, have occurred if we had had no immigration laws, but the immigration law that formed the background to the case was precisely the same law as that operated by the Labour Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member. If the policies embodied in that legislation are racist, they must have been racist when the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister. For once the right hon. Gentleman was being unfair to himself as well as others, for the rules were not racist then any more than they are racist now.

The other point that needs to be made right at the outset — I cannot say that I remember its having been mentioned by the hon. Gentleman in his speech—is that in 1979 the Home Office granted Mr. Mundiya indefinite leave to remain here. He was given leave to stay here permanently. That would have been the end of the matter so far as the Home Office was concerned, but for one thing. In December 1981 Mrs. Mundiya telephoned the immigration service in Hull, saying that her husband had left her and that he should not be allowed to stay in the country any longer.

I am somewhat surprised that the hon. Gentleman never thought fit to mention a word of that. The story starts, not with an investigation by the Home Office, but with an allegation by Mrs. Mundiya.

Let us consider what is in the Parliamentary Commissioner's report, rather than what was not in it. There are two specific criticisms in the report. The first is that the Home Office failed to appreciate that the term "marriage of convenience", which appeared in a letter written to the then hon. Member for Bradford, West, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), could cause Mrs. Mundiya and her family distress. That criticism has been accepted by the Home Office, and apologies have been offered. The other criticism is that the immigration service took too long to answer a letter which Mrs. Mundiya had written asking why it had been decided that her husband should be allowed to remain here when she clearly wanted him out of the country. That, too, has been accepted, and again apologies have been offered. However, the use of those findings by the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Gorton as the basis for a virulent attack on the immigration service, the Home Office and immigration policies generally seems to show no more than that the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman have lost all sense of proportion.

The hon. Gentleman has, of course, mentioned another rather different matter—the fact that two immigration officers involved in the Mundiya case have made allegations of victimisation by senior management. The PCA makes it clear in his report that it is no part of his function to deal with these allegations and it would be entirely wrong for me to spend over much time dealing with them tonight. All I need say is that last July—the hon. Gentleman did not mention this either, if I remember correctly—the Home Office appointed a senior official from outside the immigration and nationality department to investigate the officers' allegations, but the two men declined to meet the official or to put their case to him until the PCA's report on Mrs. Mundiya was available. Now that it is available, I hope that the investigating officer will soon be able to get on with his inquiries, that the two officers will co-operate with him, and that the hon. Gentleman will encourage them to do so.

I shall now return to the facts of Mrs. Mundiya's case, Mrs. Mundiya married her husband, a citizen of Pakistan, in this country in May 1978, but the marriage did not give him an immediate right to remain here permanently. The Labour Government of the day had introduced a one-year probationary period for foreign husbands and the rules introduced by that Government said that that time limit on a foreign husband's stay would not be removed and that leave to remain would not be granted if the Secretary of State had reason to believe that the marriage was one of convenience entered into primarily to obtain settlement here or if one of the parties no longer had any intention of living with the other.

In June 1979, however, Mr. Mundiya applied for indefinite leave to remain on the basis of his marriage. On the strength of a letter which, on the face of it, had been signed by Mrs. Mundiya, and which suggested that the parties were living together at Mrs. Mundiya's parent address, the Home Office granted the application.

Then in December 1981, came Mrs. Mundiya's telephone call. What she said must have caused great surprise to the immigration service. Here was Mrs. Mundiya asking for the conditions of her husband's stay to be curtailed when, on the face of it, she had, by a letter back in 1979, been instrumental in getting him permanent settlement. Clearly something was wrong, and there was cause for investigation. Mrs. Mundiya had to be seen, and when she was seen she said that the letter did not bear her signature and that, at the time it was written, she had not been living with her husband. In November 1978, she said, he had gone off to live with his brothers.

[Mr. David Waddington]

Mr. Mundiya was then interviewed, but he said that, although it was true he had not been living with his wife at the time, the letter was genuine. She had signed it.

The House will realise that, had it been known that Mr. and Mrs. Mundiya were no longer living together when the letter was written, Mr. Mundiya's application for indefinite leave to remain as a foreign husband would have been refused under the rules passed by the Labour Government. The letter, therefore, was seen as a deception and the leave to remain which had been granted a nullity. This led to the decision that Mr. Mundiya be detained as an illegal entrant pending his removal to Pakistan.

The circumstances surrounding Mr. Mundiya's detention as an illegal entrant and his release soon after are the subject of a separate investigation by the PCA and it would not be proper for me to comment on Mr. Mundiya's case now except in so far as is necessary to explain his wife's position. Clearly relevant to the present matter is the fact that, when representations were made on Mr. Mundiya's behalf with pleas that he should not be removed from the country, those representations included a letter from the Bradford law centre which suggested that the immigration officer who had been investigating his case had been on such good terms with Mrs. Mundiya and her father that he had found it impossible to be objective.

In the light of that, it was decided that Mr. Mundiya should be released while further inquiries were made and while the allegation was investigated by a senior officer unconnected with the case. It was decided also that the signature on the letter should be submitted for forensic examination. The senior officer carried out his investigation and concluded that the immigration officer had not been biased, but forensic examination of the letter revealed that the signature probably was Mrs. Mundiya's, and as a result my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury, who is now the Minister for Overseas Development, wrote to the then hon. Member for Bradford, West saying that it was now accepted that there was no intention on Mr. Mundiya's part to decieve the Home Office, and that accordingly Mr. Mundiya's leave to remain was not viewed as a nullity and he had been released.

The Parliamentary Commissioner's report shows, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, that the representations made on Mr. Mundiya's behalf were taken extremely seriously by the Home Office and dealt with speedily, leading to his release. Whether in those circumstances, and in the light of the fact that Mr. Mundiya's case is now being investigated by the Parliamentary Commissioner, the hon. Gentleman was wise to talk as he did the other day of senior officers having made a mistake in attempting to remove him from the country, I know not. We must wait for the commissioner's findings to decide that. However, I know that it was thoroughly irresponsible of the hon. Gentleman to seek the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 on 29 November and, at column 1117, claim that the officers tried to cover up what had happened by asserting that the marriage was one of convenience. There is nothing whatsoever in the report which we are debating to lead to that conclusion.

It is, of course, conceded that a mistake was made in my right hon. Friend's letter of 17 September. The letter was right to explain that Mr. Mundiya was detained because it was believed that his leave to remain had been vitiated by deception, but it was a mistake to say that evidence had emerged that the marriage was one of convenience. It mystifies me, however, how the hon. Gentleman can allege, as he did on 29 November, that the phrase was inserted in the letter to cover up the alleged mistake in trying to remove Mr. Mundiya.

There was no need to allege a marriage of convenience in order to explain Mr. Mundiya's earlier detention. We all know why that happened. It is rather preposterous to talk of a cover-up when it is plain that when the former hon. Member for Bradford, West produced further evidence about Mr. Mundiya's marriage it was immediately investigated and acted upon and Mr. Mundiya was released.

So there it is. The facts speak for themselves. The other day the hon. Gentleman talked of the Home Office viewing immigration as a political battlefield. It is he who has tried to create a battle, but he seems tonight to be short of troops. There is no glory here for him and there is certainly no shame to be attached to the immigration service, which had to deal with a difficult case where the parties were at odds. The immigration service and the Home Office did their best in those circumstances to be even-handed.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The Minister's reply was disgraceful. He has not accepted ministerial responsibility for what was done by his Department's servants. One would think that the ombudsman had never issued a report critical in the most stringent terms of malpractice within the immigration service. The least one would have expected from anyone but him——

Mr. Waddington rose——

Mr. Kaufman: No, I shall not give way. The least one would have expected would have been an unqualified apology from the Minister for what was done by his servants.

Mr. Waddington: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman has risen in the last moment or two of the debate to make a statement which he must know is completely incorrect. In the first words of my speech I said that I accepted the criticisms made by the Parliamentary Commissioner and that we in the Home Office had consequently apologised to Mrs. Mundiya.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. That is a matter for argument, not a point of order.

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister did not apologise, but merely said that apologies had been made. His characteristically squalid speech confirms every critical statement made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), with which I fully associate the Labour Front Bench. The Minister's attitude towards immigration and racial matters is a reflection of the inherent racism of the Government——

Mr. Waddington: Has the right hon. Gentleman read the report?

Mr. Kaufman: Yes, my hon. Friend gave me a copy. He deserves every credit for representing his constituents and all the ethnic minorities, who clearly can expect neither justice nor decency from the Home Office.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 14 December 1984

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Torture

9.35 am

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by 2,000 residents of the Welwyn Hatfield constituency and neighbouring areas, who are registering their strong support for the campaign against torture organised by Amnesty International. My petitioners wish to see torture totally eradicated from the world.

I very much share the concerns expressed by my constituents and wish to be fully associated with this petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Human Embryos

9.36 am

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by 1,000 residents of the Welwyn Hatfield constituency and neighbouring areas, who are responding to the Government's invitation to comment on the Warnock committee report via the Life organisation. My petitioners welcome the report's statement that

"The status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation", and its recommendation that

"the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law."

I very much share the concerns expressed by my constituents and wish to be fully associated with this petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I beg to ask leave to present on behalf of over 2,000 of my constituents in the city of Cambridge a petition concerning the protection of the human embryo, which concludes with the words:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

I wish to associate myself strongly in sympathy with my constituents' petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of 2,500 of my constituents in Slough. It is in similar terms to those presented by my hon. Friends the Members for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) and for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James). The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

When I was lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, in the recent debate in the House on the Warnock report, I made it clear that I support fully the sentiments expressed in the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I beg to ask leave to present a petition about the protection of the human embryo. I associate myself strongly with the terms of the petition, the final paragraph of which reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on the protection of the human embryo in the same terms as those already presented.

My petition is signed by 1,635 residents in and around the Berwick-upon-Tweed constituency. The petitioners refer to the statement in the Warnock report:

"The status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation".

My petitioners seek legislation in the terms already described to give the human embryo that protection.

It is my hope that such legislation will be before the House in this Session and that I shall be able to sponsor and support it.

To lie upon the Table.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of a large number of my constituents in south-west Cambridgeshire with which I agree and in which my constituents pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray etc.

The famous Bourn Hall clinic is in my constituency. It is known throughout the world. About 300 babies have been born there as a result of fertilisation in vitro to men and women who otherwise would have had no chance of having their own children. Work is done there to avert the birth of abnormal babies through inherited defects. That work does not always receive the attention that it deserves. The Bourn Hall clinic welcomes the Warnock report and agrees that the embryo of the human species should be protected by law, as do I and my petitioners.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I beg to ask leave to present two petitions relating to the Warnock report on behalf of a large number of my constituents in Cliftonville,

[Mr. Roger Gale]

Margate, Whitbrook, Herne Bay and Herne village. The petition was collected by Mrs. J. Kruger of Margate, and Mrs. Joyce Thompson of Herne Bay.

The petitions are similar to those already presented. I draw attention particularly to the phrase in the petition:

> The status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation.

The petition also recommends that > the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law.

That has my full support.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by residents of the Stafford constituency in response to the Government's request for comments on the Warnock report. I totally agree with the contents of the petition, as I said in the debate on the Warnock report. The petition prays that > the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any proceeding which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned). And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I beg to ask leave to present five petitions on the protection of the human embryo in the names of Mary B. Barry of 36 Highview road, Ealing, W13, and 1,213 of my constituents, Julie and Carole Taylor of 35 Jubilee road, Perivale, Greenford which contains a large number of signatures, J. J. Bateson of 104 Barnmouth avenue, Perivale which contains many signatures, Mrs. and Miss Meakins of 64 Greenford avenue, W7, Pastor Stephen Bickley of the International Presbyterian church, Drayton Green, Ealing, W13, and Mr. Clive Bishop of 43 Eastmead avenue, Greenford, of the Knights of St. Columba, St. John Fisher church, Perivale.

I have spoken in the House previously but briefly saying that life is sacred, being in the image of God, from the moment of conception and therefore should not in any circumstances be violated by man. I therefore associate myself strongly with my constituents whose petition states:

> Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray etc.

I hope for early legislation along those lines.

To lie upon the Table.

Rates Act 1984

9.46 am

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of over 30,000 people of the London borough of Greenwich, in which they pray that > your honourable House repeals the Rates Act 1984.

Under that Act, the Greenwich borough council is subject to rate capping on the ground that it is unduly extravagant and that the ratepayers need protection from unnecessary spending. However, the petitioners, most of whom are ratepayers, plead that that is not true since the members of the council are directly elected by the people of Greenwich, and therefore are accountable to them for the decisions that they make. Moreover, they contend that the Rates Act is damaging to the people and the services of their borough, many of which are run to meet the needs of the elderly, the disabled, the sick and the poor of the borough. The petitioners believe that such vulnerable people will suffer as a consequence of rate capping and that 1,000 employees of the council will lose their employment as a result of it.

Above all, the petitioners say that the borough has lost tens of millions of pounds of rate support grant and ask for that money to be restored to them. The petition states:

> Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House repeals the Rates Act 1984 and restores the tens of millions of pounds taken from our Rate Support Grant. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

I should like very strongly to associate myself with the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Homeless Persons (Accommodation)

9.47 am

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move,

That this House, in view of the appalling conditions, harassment, exploitation and high fire risks in houses of multiple occupation, calls upon the Government to introduce legislation to regulate conditions and charges in such houses; further to make single payments available for all claimants obtaining unfurnished accommodation; to review its latest proposals for board and lodgings payments; and to increase the provision of secure rented accommodation by local authorities and housing associations.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to initiate a debate on a subject which concerns all hon. Members. During the past five years there has been a sustained increase in the number of people who are forced to use board and lodging houses. In 1979 all or part of the boarding charges for 41,000 households were paid for by supplementary benefit. The number had risen to 139,000 by 1984, according to official Department of Health and Social Security figures.

Today I shall demonstrate the need to introduce legislation to regulate conditions and charges in houses of multiple occupation which I shall refer to as HMOs. I shall deal in particular with harassment—young women being pressurised to provide sexual gratification to landlords in exchange for rent reductions; exploitation—residents are sometimes forced to sign over their benefit giros to management under threat of assault; fire risk—there are 10 times more chances of being in a fire in an HMO than in self-contained accommodation; conditions — which can be bad physically; and the food provided. I shall also comment on the furniture grant system and the Government's recent proposals being considered by the Social Security Advisory Committee.

First, I shall deal with the conditions that prevail in many boarding houses which can be classified as HMOs. The Institute of Environmental Health Officers estimates that about 85 per cent. of HMOs in England and Wales fall well below the minimum housing standards, as laid down by various Acts. From my local knowledge, I know that much boarding accommodation is used by unemployed people and is characterised by damp bedrooms, inadequate heating, overcrowded washing facilities and the enforced sharing of rooms with strangers, sometines even with members of the opposite sex. There is inadequate maintenance which constitutes a health and safety hazard, with cases of bad wiring, broken windows and defective plasterwork. There are examples of poor quality food provided by the owners, and, in general, poor maintenance standards.

A report on Newcastle HMOs was published in April this year by an organisation in my area. Its authors included local authority representatives. The report gave the views of 62 residents of 13 establishements within the DHSS board and lodging limit. According to the report, half the residents complained of damp bedrooms, and more than half found the rooms too cold. Only one in five had exclusive use of a hand basin, and some residents had to share a bathroom with between 10 and 20 others. One resident in four compained about the food. They complained of tiny quantities and in some cases of food poisoning. Some so-called hotels did not even provide food, and, although full hotel services were charged for, the residents had to wash their own bed linen. Another factor of great concern is the lack of fire precautions in such places. According to the latest figures from official Government sources, 600 people were killed in fires in HMOs between 1978 and 1982. Residents in such accommodation are 10 times more likely to die or to be seriously injured than people living in self-contained accommodation.

Three weeks ago, on 20 November, there was a fire at a bed-and-breakfast establishment in Camden owned by a company called London Lets, the proprietor of which is Mr. J. Doniger. On 3 December, Salman Rushdie, an author of some renown, wrote an article in The Guardian in which he described the situation in the house at the time of the fire:

"When it started, no alarm rang. It had been switched off. The fire extingishers were empty. The fire exits were blocked. It was night time but the stairs were in darkness because there were no bulbs in the lighting sockets. And in the single, cramped top floor room, where the cooker was next to the bed, Mrs. Abdul Karim, a Bangladeshi woman, and her 5 year old son and 3 year old daughter died of suffocation."

All hon. Members would agree that the conditions were disgraceful and outrageous, yet a local councillor has estimated that the cost of housing such a family in that accommodation was £280 a week. As Mr. Rushdie commented, death traps are not always economical.

I am critical of the Secretary of State for the Environment for not adding to the statutory order requiring all local authorities to inspect all HMOs with three or more storeys and a gross floor space of more than 500 sq m. Only 2 per cent. of HMOs are of that type. The majority of those who have died in fires were living in smaller establishments.

Chris Holmes, the respected director of the Campaign for the Homeless and Rootless, told Nick Fielding in an article in London Housing:

"The fire at Glouscester Place tragically shows the need for there to be a legal duty on local authorities to inspect this kind of property. If an HMO Act had existed that family need not have died".

In September 1983 the DOE asked local authority associations and others whether the existing minimum protection should be extended. However, as late as July 1984, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who I am glad to see in his place, said:

"The implications of any extension in the scope of the existing order are receiving careful study. My right hon. Friend will make a statement as soon as this is completed."—[Official Report, 11 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 539.]

That statement is long overdue. It is urgently needed. I ask the Minister to urge his right hon. Friend to make a statement to the House in early 1985, because the Under-Secretary informed my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) in January 1984 that consultation had been completed.

The consultation, therefore, had been completed a year ago. I have a catalogue of replies to letters and parliamentary questions which record the way in which the matter has been continually delayed throughout 1984.

The Government should also introduce legislation on conditions in multi-occupied housing, because there is clear evidence of the failure of the bewildering array of housing and public health Acts and circulars to make any significant impact on conditions in such accommodation. For example, in 1982, on an estimated 145,000 substandard HMOs, local authorities served only 627 repair notices, 1,414 notices about basic amenities, 651 closing orders and about 4,000 management orders. Only in 17 cases did the local authorities take control of HMOs because the health, safety and welfare of residents were at risk.

In June this year, a major report by the Institution of Environmental Health Officers revealed:

"Few local authorities throughout the country have a comprehensive approach . . . or even a coherent policy".

It is clear that existing legislation is inadequate and ineffectual in requiring local authorities to maintain proper standards in HMOs. However, the Government still insist that there is no need for new legislation. They consistently failed to support the HMO Bill that was before the House at the time of the general election.

Residents of HMOs suffer harassment and financial exploitation. Through my contacts with residents in board and lodging accommodation in the north-east and with the agencies concerned with their circumstances, I can vouch for the existence of systematic harassment of residents by landlords in many establishments. Residents are forced to hand over their benefit giros for cashing by the management, under threat of assault. Landlords' "heavies" wait at offices to catch residents receiving personal issue giros and ensure that the giros are signed over to the management. Residents are threatened or assaulted for complaining about standards of food.

Especially disturbing is the evidence of sexual harassment of women residents by landlords. Pressure is put on women to provide sexual gratification for landlords in return for rent reductions or in lieu of eviction when benefit giros are delayed.

These occurrences are not hearsay. I am aware of sworn affidavits from residents supporting such allegations, and I have been supplied with written and signed statements by other residents. I shall not apologise to hon. Members for reading extracts from three such statements. The first statement is from Mr. C:

"Whilst I was resident in a b & b establishment in Newcastle, I saw first hand how the landlord would physically hurt some of his tenants and how he sexually harassed some of the female residents by way of suggestions of other ways to pay the rent."

There is also a statement from a young female whom I shall call Miss X:

"When I moved to an annex I thought I would be safe because there were other young girls living there. I soon found out that the owner was coming to see these girls who had a special arrangement with the owner, one girl was short of money and was foolish to borrow money from him which she could not afford to pay back. The only way to pay him was on one or two visits a week from him. She used to hide in my room or run out the back door when the owner was visiting the building. He offered me a loan. When I said no, he offered me enough money to see me through till my giro came. For this he told me I had only had to use my hand to satisfy his needs. I objected to this, and when I knew he was visiting I used to lock my door, or go out."

My final quotation on this subject is a statement by someone to whom I shall refer as Mr. B. He said:

"I have seen a bed covered in excrement and soaking wet, and the landlord's remarks were, 'turn it over—they won't know'. If you were lucky enough to get good sheets you hung onto them like they were gold. You took them to the laundry and cleaned them yourself. You would not dare to complain as the landlord would put you onto the street, or his bullyboy mate would call to see you late at night and he had keys to get into any room or building that he wants to get into. Young girls would run out the back door or hide in the wardrobes when the landlord called as he always 'had something to discuss with them'. But I could go on for hours about the things that go on in these bed and breakfast establishments. People go into these places as a stepping stone to their own house or flat and they end up in prison. I was lucky, I escaped!"

I hope that the House found those accounts as harrowing to hear as I did to read them. They are representative of the evidence that I have been given in preparation for the debate. They are not exaggerated and I assure the House that, given time, I could have read or mentioned much more harrowing events.

It is regrettable that residents in such accommodation have virtually no security of tenure and no redress against such harrassment. I should like to pay tribute to Newcastle city council which is so worried about what is happening in its area that it has guaranteed that any resident who is evicted for complaining or campaigning about conditions will be rehoused.

I shall now consider costs. Board and lodging provides a lucrative business for landlords who have cashed in on the growing homelessness. DHSS expenditure on keeping people in such accommodation has soared recently. In 1979, about £52 million was spent each year and the predicted sum for 1984 is £380 million. It might rise even higher. Such expenditure cannot be equated with any notion of value for money, bearing in mind the conditions that residents have to endure. Such expenditure guarantees the wealth of landlords, however. One Newcastle landlord is estimated to have a gross annual income of £160,000 a year from six properties. According to a competent group of researchers in the north-east, that is by no means exceptional.

I am worried about the Government's proposal to curb expenditure. The current proposals which are with the Social Security Advisory Committee will do nothing to prevent harrassment, nothing to reduce profiteering and nothing to improve conditions in HMOs. On 29 November, the Secretary of State issued a paper, the theme of which was that expenditure needed to be brought under control. During 1983, there was a massive increase in expenditure from about £200 million to £380 million a year. If my figures are not quite what the Government think they are, I am sure that the Minister will correct me. I understand that the cost is projected to increase by a further 125 per cent. during 1984-85. That would take the total to more than £500 million. If the new arrangements are brought into operation on 1 April 1985, Shelter—another highly respected pressure group—predicts that there will be more homeless people on the streets.

It is interesting that we are discussing this topic on the eve of Christmas. The slogan "Crisis at Christmas" is deeply relevant to the people who live in the type of acommodation of which I am speaking. They have virtually no security of tenure and some of them may find themselves on the streets during Christmas. It is certain that, unless the Secretary of State modifies his proposals, many people will suffer dire and serious consequences.

I shall not read all the Secretary of State's proposals but shall select a few that will have a serious effect. One is his proposal to limit benefit ceilings of £60 to £70 a week in London and £50 to £60 outside London. That would cut the amount of benefit received without there being any effect on the charge made for accommodation by rent regulations. Few landlords will drop their charges, so residents will be forced to pay rent out of their meal and personal allowance or move to cheaper accommodation, if such a thing is available. If they can find such accommodation, I have no doubt that it will be even more inferior. The choice could be between starving or moving. Some people might have to do both.

The DHSS's proposal states that the new limits may mean that, in some expensive places such as central London, claimants will have to accept only basic shared accommodation or live in cheaper areas. However, if residents look for accommodation elsewhere, they will quickly cease to receive any benefit, because the Government propose to limit board and lodging payments for people who move to accommodation outside their local DHSS office area, after two or four weeks. After that time, benefit will not be paid. We are all anxious about young people in these difficult social and economic times and yet they are to be especially penalised by the proposals. To 16 and 17-year-olds in boarding accommodation, the Government propose to pay only the non-householder rate of benefit, which will inevitably be less than the charge made. It is about £17. I am pleased to see the Minister for Housing and Construction nodding agreement.

If introduced, the proposals will have several effects. First, by reducing the amounts payable for lodgings, they will force claimants into worse accommodation. Overcrowding will therefore be increased and the availability of better quality accommodation will be drastically reduced. The already critical problem of residents in boarding accommodation will be made even worse. Secondly, people will be forced to move but if they move into another DHSS office area—there are several such areas in many towns and cities — they will be entitled to benefit for an extremely short time. Presumably they will then be forced penniless on to the streets. I cannot believe that even the present Government have that intention.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I understand that hostels and night shelters are not exempt from the limits and that some may have to close down because of the reduction in incomes from residents. The Government have encouraged housing associations to enter agreements with local voluntary organisations to set up hostel projects for homeless people. Many such projects in Wales, for example, will not be able to continue if the proposals are implemented. I ask the Government to re-examine that matter——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. I hope that the hon. Lady will be brief—this is an intervention.

Mrs. Clwyd: Perhaps my hon. Friend will ask the Government to re-examine the proposal. Some local authorities such as Swansea city council are to be congratulated on enforcing limits on houses in multiple occupation from 1 January. It is to impose heavy penalties for infringements.

Mr. Boyes: I note what my hon. Friend has said and applaud what Swansea city council has done. I hope that many other authorities will follow its lead.

What I cannot understand is that young people have been singled out for especially harsh treatment. The proposal to pay them even less than the proposed reduced maximum will mean that 16 and 17-year-olds will not be able to use boarding accommodation, despite the lack of alternatives.

In their obsessive pursuit of public expenditure cuts, the Government have either failed to recognise the dramatic social effects of the proposals or are callously ignoring them. I estimate that about 50,000 claimants are likely to be affected by the proposals and forced to live in dangerous and squalid conditions. That can only increase the already serious threat of death or injury from fire, or make them homeless and penniless. If ever there was a charter for a return to conditions experienced by the poor in Victorian times, the Secretary of State has produced it.

I ask the Government seriously to consider the consequences of the proposals that they will seek to introduce early in 1985. I do not think that they have thought out what will happen to our youngsters if the proposals become law.

I object to the notion that is perpetrated that some people are scroungers. The notion that thousands of people, especially youngsters, are living the good life in boarding accommodation at taxpayers' expense underlies the announcement. That is not so. Given the conditions and insecurity and harassment in such accommodation, it is clear that people do not choose to live in it. They are forced to live in it because of a lack of alternatives. They are not happy in it. Hon. Members may be aware of the occupation of Camden town hall by residents of the boarding house to which I referred earlier. They are demanding decent, self-contained housing where they can live normal independent lives. They are calling on the council to empty the boarding houses within six months. To judge by the support and encouragement that they have received for their campaign, they are not alone in that demand.

The Government are well aware of people's views. On Channel 4 in February the Minister for Housing and Construction said of boarding accommodation:

> "It is very expensive, on the whole people don't like it and it's much more economical that people should be in houses or flats or in hostels specially designed for the homeless than in this kind of bed and breakfast accommodation."

If the Minister is correct, why are people forced to accept such accommodation? It is too simplistic to make judgments in terms of abuse and exploitation of the system by young people, as Conservative Members have suggested.

Shelter suggests that the following three points should be considered. First, no mention is made of the impact of youth or adult unemployment on the cohesion of the family. Secondly, no mention is made of the impact of the cutting of the housing addition of £3·10 from the weekly benefit of unemployed young people living in their parent's homes. Thirdly, no mention is made of the effects of denying furniture grants to young people who may be able to acquire a district council or housing association tenancy.

The rule that requires claimants to take suitable furnished accommodation where it is available has forced many young people into board and lodging accommodation. In the long term that is extremely expensive for the DHSS. That seems to fly in the face of Conservative party philosophy.

Homelessness among young people has reached crisis proportions in small towns, cities and conurbations. It is not the result of a rapid growth in the attraction of young people to the so-called bright lights of large cities. In many instances they have been forced to leave home because of the breakdown of relationships with parents. It is no coincidence that that has arisen at a time of record unemployment.

[Mr. Boyes]

The chairman of housing in Newcastle—priority is given to housing all homeless 16 and 17-year-olds—was reported in the Evening Chronicle of 26 November as saying:

"These are not runaways with comfortable homes to return to, but are the casualties of the increasing economic pressures on many families, particularly in this region."

There is not one mention of the concept of value for money in the Secretary of State's statement. It is vital for people who live in such accommodation that charges should relate to standards. We are seeking legislation about that.

Many hon. Members are worried about the refusal of the DHSS to make furniture grants available to single people and childless couples moving into unfurnished council houses. Despite dwindling housing resources, some local authorities are attempting to meet the housing needs of residents of boarding houses, but those laudable intentions are being effectively torpedoed by the regulations governing single payments for furniture and household equipment.

Whereas the entitlement to such payments for claimants who are pensioners, sick, or disabled, who have dependent children or who are pregnant, is based on the need for furniture, there are further conditions for single people and childless couples. They must already have been receiving supplementary benefit for six months, and they must also show that there is no suitable alternative furnished accommodation available. That involves obtaining as many as 15 refusals of such accommodation from landlords.

In addition, because the regulations and policy guidance instructions are so complex and tortuous, it is almost impossible for claimants to know whether they qualify. There is evidence from advice centres that many claimants who are entitled to payments receive them only after substantial negotiation and with assistance from advisers and Members of Parliament.

In numerous cases board and lodging accommodation is regarded by the DHSS as being a suitable alternative, despite its insecurity and often appalling conditions. In other instances the homes of parents, friends and relatives where the claimant has been staying are regarded as suitable, even if the claimant has been asked to leave or has been thrown out. That is totally unwarranted discrimination against single people and childless couples. It fails to acknowledge that they have genuine housing needs and no means of providing themselves with furniture.

In many areas the offer of unfurnished accommodation is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity because of the acute shortage of such housing. To be unable to take up a tenancy because of the refusal of a payment for furniture is devastating. It is ironic in the light of the Government's concern about the increasing use of board and lodging accommodation by supplementary benefit claimants that the provisions governing single payments for furniture force many claimants into board and lodging houses. The Government, I am sure, will see the logic of that argument. It does not make economic sense.

Calculations made in the north-east of England show that the DHSS will pay £3,900 a year to keep a single person in boarding accommodation at the current local maximum, as against £2,433 a year for an average council flat, which would mean a saving of £1,500 per person a year. If a grant of £400 a year for furniture was made to enable a person to move into unfurnished accommodation, which he or she will clearly want, the DHSS would still save money and enable that person to live a normal life.

It would even be cheaper to build council houses. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment stated in a written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) that the average cost of providing a one-bedroom council flat was less than £17 a week, including subsidy. That is far less than the average board and lodging payment for a single person.

I submit that Government policies are forcing many thousands of people to live in squalid and dangerous conditions — against their will — in which many are likely to die. The profits accruing to landlords represent a misuse of public funds that should be put towards providing housing for rent and grants to assist those on benefit to furnish their accommodation.

I therefore call upon the Government immediately to announce an extension of the fire precaution regulations under schedule 24 of the Housing Act 1980 to all houses in multiple occupation; to introduce legislation to control standards in such housing as provided in the Housing (Houses in Multiple Occupation) Bill 1983; to withdraw recently announced proposals to restrict payments for board and lodgings; to provide furniture grants according to the needs of those on benefits to enable them to furnish newly acquired accommodation; and to amend the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 to afford rights to permanent housing for those single people and childless couples currently excluded from its provisions.

I share the Government's anxiety about board and lodging payments — they line the pockets of a new generation of slum landlords. If real progress is to be made, the cause not the symptoms must be tackled. The system must be amended, not its victims punished even more.

The programme that I have outlined represents a cost-effective and socially responsible response to squalor and exploitation. The Government's response will show whether they seriously want to tackle the problem or simply to continue to increase the misery of those who have no option.

I wish to pay tribute to all those voluntary organisations such as CHAR, Shelter and Single Homeless on Tyneside in Newcastle and others in many parts of the country which are asking the Government to improve the living standards of young people living in such homes. Although I have not mentioned all the organisations by name, I assure them that their views and the documentation that I have received in preparation for this debate have been taken into account. I and my colleagues shall continue to press the Government until the living standards and accommodation that homeless people are entitled to and deserve have been achieved.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): The House should express its thanks to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) for introducing this motion. It includes within it a number of aspects of the problems which are of great interest to hon. Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Gentleman mentioned a number of cases which should worry us. I am sure that if the evidence is available the people involved will be punished. However, when he has heard what I have to say it will remain to be seen whether he will say that he is pleased that he raised the subject.

I suspect that the hon. Gentleman's motion has arisen out of a move by the Government, which I strongly welcome, to change the present procedure. I thank all the Ministers who have responded quickly to the anxiety which has been expressed in various parts of the country.

I pay tribute to various people in my constituency, who were among the first to bring this matter to light. It subsequently featured fairly loudly in the press. The people to whom I am referring include members of the chamber of commerce, the local council, the district council, the police, local officers of the DHSS and various others who have co-operated by providing figures and information about what has been going on.

Newquay is an extremely attractive, well-known tourist centre, to which many people from all over the country go on holiday. It has attracted an unfortunate element to it, and also publicity arising from the board and lodging allowances. Being highly tourist-oriented, my constituency has a number of establishments which in recent years have gone over to the care of the elderly who are in receipt of supplementary benefit for their board and lodging.

I shall seek to touch on the development of the process which has brought us to the present state of affairs and then to comment more specifically on the proposals which the Government have laid before the House and upon which they seek consultation.

I regret to tell my hon. Friend the Minister that, having thought about the matter deeply and analysed the problem, I am fearful that the Government's proposals will not achieve the results that he hopes, and I urge further changes.

In 1982 the board and lodging allowance for unemployed people and those receiving residential care in nursing homes amounted to £205 million. That figure rose in 1983 to £380 million. It is estimated that during the current year it will be £580 million, of which £380 million goes to those receiving board and lodging allowance.

I congratulate my hon. Friends at the Department of Health and Social Services making it plain that they do not intend to push elderly, disabled or handicapped people out of nursing homes. That would be wrong and reprehensible, but when one considers the present system, it is evident that drastic changes are necessary.

Under the supplementary benefit system, the cost of board, lodging and meals is paid, and there is an extra personal allowance for clothing. In 1983 it became plain that the locally fixed arrangements were getting out of hand, and in November 1983 local DHSS offices were asked to fix maxima for their areas.

I shall cite Newquay as an example. Hon Members on both sides of the House may recall that national publicity was attracted to the fact that many young people were coming from the north-west to take up board and lodging in Newquay and were able to occupy premises there and greatly enhance the amount that they could obtain on benefit. Stories were reported of people coming to Newquay and instead of being able to claim £26·80 as a single person living in accommodation with cooking facilities, they could claim £43·30 for board and lodging and an extra £8·85 for personal expenses. It hit the press that those people were living in that lovely town, not doing any work, and claiming those sums of money.

I responded to that publicity, and the various organisations that I have mentioned took the matter up with the Government. I must confess that I had not realised the circumstances which prevailed across the country. A national scandal has been exposed and the figures show that, far from Newquay being extravagant, the DHSS officials there are among the most frugal and careful with taxpayers' money of any in the country.

At this point I refer hon. Members to a circular entitled "Supplementary Benefit local limits on board and lodging payments to be adopted by the Secretary of State for Social Services under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Amendment and Temporary Provisions Regulations 1984", a copy of which is in the Library. This document sets out the limits for all towns and areas, including those represented by hon. Members who are present today. I discovered to my amazement that if, in the west country, three young people were discussing their entitlement and one said that he came from Newquay and was claiming £43 a week plus personal clothing allowance and so on, making up to about £52 a week, he would not be getting the most. If the second young man came from Plymouth, he would be able to say that he could claim £55 a week. To my embarrassment, I discovered that the third young man, if he were living in my constituency, in Launceston, would be claiming £65 a week, and receiving it.

There is an extraordinary discrepancy between the amounts that people can claim in various parts of the west country. In London there are just as many discrepancies. For example, somebody claiming benefit in Hendon as an ordinary individual with board and lodging can receive £77 a week. The residential care allowance that can be claimed is £154 a week. The claim for nursing home residence goes down to £110 a week. However, along the road, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), the board and lodging payment is £82·30 per week and residential care is £200 a week, and for a nursing home it is £275 a week.

The figures show that board and lodging payments acros the country stretch from £40 a week to £110 a week. Residential care allowances go from as low as £51 a week to £215 a week and nursing home allowances from £80 a week to £299 a week. If any right hon. or hon. Member can justify that, I should like to hear his reasons.

Various criticisms were made by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington about the way in which the system is working. I shall criticise it from a different point of view. At the moment, it is difficult to check the costs within these homes. Clearly, cartels are being operated between homes. It is interesting to note that there are examples of people going to find out whether there is accommodation for them, particularly in residential care, and being given one price if they are on DHSS benefit and a lower figure if they are paying privately. That is scandalous, and it shows that the Government have to pay far more than is necessary. There is an increasing mix-up between the responsibilities of the councils and those of the DHSS.

In the board and lodging sector in my constituency and elsewhere there have been reports of the most disturbing arrangements, and some prosecutions, of hoteliers and claimants getting into agreements to defeat the system. If the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington is under any illusion, he need not suspect my constituency of being a high-paid area because, quite to the contrary, it is a low-paid area. I say to every Labour Member who sincerely champions the cause of the low-paid that the indignation among the low-paid in my constituency about the high sums of money being paid to board and lodging claimants is unbelievable. They are very angry. They do not see any justification for this, and they want it to be stopped.

Considerable numbers of young people are coming to my constituency. I have it from various sources that at least 1,000 in Newquay alone have come from the north-west, and recent suggestions are that this figure has risen to over 2,000. A fundamental point needs to be made. The figures show apparently large-scale unemployment in Newquay. In May of this year, for example, in a town of about 17,000 people, 2,071 were unemployed. Only 35 of those were school leavers. An analysis of the figures shows that 52 per cent. of the unemployed males in Newquay are under 29 and 40 per cent. are under 24. It is impossible for Newquay, of its own accord, to have that number of unemployed people.

If any hon. Member disbelieves me, I have here a letter from the local tourist information office, which represents the Newquay hoteliers' and caterers' association, with about 750 establishments. It tells me that, despite the level of unemployment, and despite the fact that every week in the past few weeks as many as two dozen youngsters have been arriving in Newquay, more than 100 vacancies for work have been available in hotels and restaurants in Newquay alone which it has been unable to fill. That is intolerable.

The freeze on the limits is welcome, as are the limits that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is putting on 16 and 17-year-olds. They mean that we have told young people of that age that they should rely on the home, with certain exceptional circumstances which are listed in the consultation paper. It is clear from what my hon. Friend has said that he intends to hear any views, and I am sure that he will be listening to the debate to see if the "exceptions" need to be extended. However, he has placed certain eminently fair and sensible provisos on that restriction.

My hon. Friend has made his aims known to the House. The new board and lodging allowance should be made available only to those who need that form of accommodation, and he is to be congratulated on that. The aim to improve the equity between those on supplementary benefit and those with low incomes is also welcome. To remove disincentives to work is most important. It is also important to dissuade the unscrupulous landlord, as the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington pointed out.

My hon. Friend talks about limits being proposed in London of £60 to £70, and outside London of £50 to £60. However, I remind him that this anxiety arose in no small part from the feeling of scandal, annoyance and indignation in the west country, where more than £43 a week is paid, and here we are thinking in terms of increasing it still further. Any hon. Member going round my constituency can find a wide range of available accommodation. In my view, if the limits could be set as low as £43 a week in Newquay, I fail to see why, with the obvious exception of London, they cannot be set much lower than my hon. Friend proposes.

On the consultation paper, I beg to differ strongly from my hon. Friend about those who are between 17 and 25 and the proposal to restrict their claims to two to four weeks. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington that it should be widened. I go in the opposite direction.

The Government are facing two ways already. To illustrate what I mean, I give an example of what happens at present. Let us suppose that there is a married man living in Padstow, in my constituency, who has two children and has been unemployed for nine months. His nephew, who is also unemployed, is a single man and lives with his uncle and his family, claiming the £26. The uncle sees an advertisement for a job in Oxford. He gets the job. He goes back to his excited family saying that nine months of unemployment are over. He assumes that he and his wife and children can move because he can get help to do so from the benefit office under the employment transfer allowance. He goes to the office, only to be told that he cannot get a penny under the scheme because there are local unemployed people who are deemed to be suitable for the job. He has got the job, but that does not matter. Over nine months he has run out of resources, so he cannot take the job because he cannot afford to make the move.

On hearing about this, his nephew decides that he would prefer to go to Oxford to live. He turns up at the benefit office in Oxford and claims the benefit, which from memory is more than £60. He can live there for as long as he likes, simply because he is available for work.

That must be wrong. Either the Department of Employment is correct, in which case my hon. Friend must change these regulations, or the Department of Employment is wrong and must provide help for anyone who gets on his bike and looks for work.

One way out of this is to say to anyone who is proposing to move from an area where under existing arrangements he is able to claim £26 a week, to another area which will involve him in board and lodging, that under the new scheme he will be able to obtain the board and lodging allowance only if there are no locally born suitable unemployed people available to fill vacancies in that area. If that were the case, anyone in that position would have to go at his own risk and expense.

We cannot have one law for one and another law for another. Much more research should go into this to establish a much fairer system for people living in constituencies such as mine where there are high levels of unemployment. They do not want to see their own job prospects put further at risk. More particularly, they do not want to see around them people on the dole drawing not only much more money than they are getting themselves, but much more than they could ever earn in the area. My hon. Friend should take this strongly into account during his deliberations. In areas such as mine it would bring great comfort and reassurance to many millions of people living on low incomes, having been born there, who are unable to find work.

I am sorry to have spoken at length on this subject, but I hope that the House will appreciate that I feel strongly about it and have some experience of it in my own area.

10.46 am

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): This is a very important debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on choosing this subject. It is an issue which affects many thousands of our young people.

Over the past few weeks all right hon. and hon. Members have received a great deal of information from organisations which work with homeless people. In my constituency I have the Threshold housing association, which operates in the London borough of Wandsworth and also in the London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham.

At the outset of my remarks I want to refer to one or two of Threshold's comments, because they are the views of people who over many years have tried to specialise in the services that they provide for young people, especially for young homeless people.

Threshold held its annual general meeting on Wednesday of this week. I attended as the local Member of Parliament, and I heard some of the sorrowful stories told by people working with Threshold of the problems which they have to try to resolve day in and day out. Its annual report, published only recently, says, under the heading "Young people in bed and breakfast":

"Finding homes for teenagers is a mammoth task. As workers of Threshold know the chances of obtaining suitable secure local accommodation are practically non-existent. This results in large numbers of young people facing a future in bed and breakfast establishments with no privacy or security on which to build a future. The problems of living in bed and breakfast are numerous, particularly for young people, risks of financial and sexual exploitation coming high on the list. A person is placed in a highly stressful situation while trying to cope with natural adolescent emotional growth. This type of accommodation is expensive and far from suitable for young people, many of whom are trying to fend for themselves for the first time in their lives, and with limited financial and social skills it is easy for them to end up in debt and homeless again."

Threshold says that 29 per cent. of all its clients have left home because of family disputes, and 21 per cent. were already in temporary accommodation when they came to see officials of Threshold.

The report continues:

"Some people leave home because it is overcrowded. Others leave because they are physically abused by their parents. Many people leave home because they are evicted by their parents. Often this is because parents expect their children to get jobs once they leave school and do not understand it when they fail to do so."

Those are the views of a respected housing association. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House could give similar examples. Both the House and the country have to realise that youngsters who are placed in this position are not scroungers. They are facing a housing problem in many areas of the country as a direct result of Government policy. Youngsters will come to my advice service tonight and say, "You are the local MP. You are the person who is supposed to advise and help people. Tell me where I can get a job. Tell me of any firms in this locality where I can go on Monday and say 'I am without work, but I want to work.'" I shall have to say to them, "I cannot help." There are no jobs in my area, even for adults with experience, so there are even fewer jobs for young people.

The problems faced by youngsters such as those referred to by the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale), are caused by the actions of the Government. That is the real indictment. A few months ago two senior members of the Government—the right hon. Lady the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — made speeches about this problem. In a speech that she made somewhere in south Wales the Prime Minister said, "If you cannot get a job in this locality, move somewhere else," but she did not say that even if people could get a job somewhere else they might not find somewhere to live. We remember the speech of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at the Conservative party conference. He said, "If you cannot get a job, be like my old Dad; get on your bike and find one." Even if somebody is fortunate enough to find a job elsewhere, he may be unable to find a place in which to live. Those two comments indicate the lack of understanding of the problem by very senior Ministers.

For many years youngsters have left home quite happily, thinking that is was time they began to build their own lives. They were able to move to many parts of the country where they could find a job and somewhere to live, but it is virtually impossible to do so now, either in London or in any of our large cities. Ministers should not need me to tell them that this is not just a problem which affects big cities. One can go to some of our smaller cities and find that they are faced with the same problems as are to be found in the London borough of Wandsworth. I shall read later a letter which illustrates this point.

We should not support abuse of this kind any more than we support tax avoidance abuse. Unfortunately, the Government do not appear to be so concerned about the millions of pounds which are not collected each year by the Inland Revenue because certain individuals have the means with which to obtain professional advice to avoid the payment of tax. We do not hear so much about tax avoidance abuse, although it is state money.

The Government ought to be helping people of all ages who become homeless. Families become homeless. That is what we should be talking about. In many parts of the country very little local authority accommodation is being built. In the London borough of Wandsworth, hardly any local authority accommodation is being built, because of the Government's policy. No doubt the Minister will tell us that this is because the Government wish to encourage incentive by the sale of thousands of council houses. In my area and in many other parts of the country, homes have been deliberately boarded up. When local authorities are asked to justify the fact that they are putting people into bed-and-breakfast accommodation when hundreds of homes have been boarded up, their reply is that, although they do not like it, they do not have the money with which to put these homes back into use. Young people and adults who are homeless do not want to live in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

The Minister must be aware of the Department of the Environment report "The Single and the Homeless". It was based on about 7,000 interviews. It dealt with the kind of accommodation which homeless people would like to have. It demonstrated that they want decent, reasonably priced accommodation in which they can prepare their own meals and live their own lives. The problem is where to find such accommodation in the United Kingdom, coupled with the opportunity to get a job. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us where they can find it. I do not believe that it is to be found anywhere in the London area.

I mentioned earlier that although we think that this is a big city problem, it is not. I received a letter this week which is a terrible indictment of life in this country in 1984. It was written by a young man who lives in my constituency. He said:

"I have been living in Northampton for the last 14 weeks. I did not find it a very pleasant experience. I was very lonely and depressed. I have now landed at my mum's doorstep last night absolutely homeless. I have been staying in bed and breakfast since I came down from Northampton for the last few nights, which has drained me of most of the money I had left. I went to social security. They gave me a list of bed-and-breakfast accommodation which is approved and they paid for it. These premises were fully booked so I had no alternative other than sleeping on a park bench because Mum has Jim and Ann at home and there really is no room for me other than spending a few nights on a soft camp bed."

This is not a sponger or somebody who is trying to abuse or work the system, but a young man who has a genuine problem. Where does he turn for help?

Today we are debating the abuse, so we are told, of social security payments. What a different attitude the Government showed last week when we were debating student grants. They do not want to see people fiddling the state of £50 and are determined to put such people in their place. We were not talking last week about the children of low-paid people. Had we been, I should have been in the forefront giving my support. We were talking about the children of people in Britain who are extremely well paid and who have done well out of the Government since they came to power in 1979. What a different attitude we are seeing today.

There is already much accommodation throughout Britain which could be made available to those in need. All that is needed is Government money to enable those properties to be brought into use. However, what we really should be talking about are standards. About three weeks ago I was a member of a Committee of the House which looked at standards in residential care accommodation. We all know the rackets that exist there. We all know the sudden great anxiety of hundreds of people throughout Britain to look after the elderly, the disabled or the sick. That is because they now realise that by setting up residential care homes large sums of money can be claimed from the DHSS to pay for the care of people in those homes. If people genuinely want to look after elderly, disabled or sick people, I applaud that, but I reject completely those who have jumped on to that bandwagon because they realise that there is a great deal of money to be made.

We know from what my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington said, and from the Threshold annual report which I read out, that standards in much bed-and-breakfast accommodation are deplorable. The Government cannot say that that situation has just arisen and that they are worried about it. They should tell us what they intend to do.

My hon. Friend talked about fire prevention. Sadly, we hear about too many fires. There is much abuse by people running such establishments. They are free to sit on their backsides and not worry about regulations, because the accommodation that they provide is needed. They believe that the powers that be will not be too difficult. It is a terrible thing to say in 1984, but it would be far more acceptable for some people to be in prison than have to live in some of the conditions that homeless people face. Wandsworth prison is in my constituency, and I know that prison can be an unpleasant place, but at least certain standards have to be observed there. In much bed-and-breakfast accommodation there are virtually none.

We heard this week that in next year's Budget tax concessions will be a top priority. That may or may not be a good thing. It will depend on who those tax concessions go to. The Government should give priority to those genuinely in need. That is something that we have not yet seen.

Life will continue to become more and more difficult for homeless people, and, in particular, for young homeless people. I hope that we shall see a much greater Government commitment to dealing with those problems. The Government know the problems that exist. All too often the Labour party is accused of believing that abuses should take place. We do not believe that. I have already mentioned those who, with great regularity, avoid paying income tax year after year. However, we do not hear much from the Government about stopping such abuses. We are entitled to expect a real commitment from the Government to provide suitable housing. Local authorities should be able to give help and advice to homeless people, especially young homeless people.

This week we have discussed the Local Government Bill, and we have commented upon the ever-increasing problems of ratecapping. It will become more and more difficult for local authorities genuinely to help people in their areas. I hope that we shall see much stronger and more sensitive legislation to tackle abuses, not only those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation but against those who have to live in such accommodation.

We do not want to hear the Government say that they are concerned about the problem but that they will leave it to local authorities to deal with. I could give countless examples of assurances from the Secretary of State for Transport that my local authority will honour a promise that he has made. My local authority is one of the greatest supporters that the Prime Minister has in local government. However, it goes out of its way to avoid any commitment to do anything. If the Government genuinely wish to see progress, they should ensure that sufficient money is ploughed into local authorities to enable them to provide the necessary services.

Until that happens, all the problems that have been mentioned here today will continue and the suffering will remain. That is a deplorable indictment against the Government in 1984. The real problems of homelessness, and those associated with it, are the direct result of the Government's policies since 1979.

11.7 am

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): I join the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) in congratulating the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on having secured first place in the ballot. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman also on having chosen an important subject. I hope that he will not think it presumptuous if I congratulate him further on his meticulous research in preparing his speech.

I hope that it will be for the convenience of the House if I intervene at this stage to comment on some of the housing matters that have been raised by the hon. Gentleman's motion. If he should catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security will comment on those matters which fall within his responsibility.

Let me deal first with the duties of local authorities under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. Their main duty is to secure accommodation for those who are genuinely homeless in the priority need categories. Those categories include families with dependent children, pregnant women, those made homeless through fire or other emergency, and those vulnerable through old age or mental or physical disability, or for some other special reason.

In our code of guidance, which was revised in July 1983, to which authorities are required to have regard, we asked them to treat as vulnerable battered women without children and young people at risk of sexual or financial exploitation. That was a particular matter to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Those priority need categories were decided by Parliament when it approved the 1977 Act. As the House knows, we considered carefully whether any change should be made when we reviewed the operation of the Act in 1982. We received many representations during that review, some in favour of extension and some against. We decided in the end to make no changes to the Act. I consider that the present categories are the right ones and that to extend them to other single people would disadvantage those in housing need on council waiting lists.

While I do not favour extending to homeless people outside the present priority need categories the duty laid on local authorities to secure accommodation, I hope that authorities will act as generously as they can in providing the advice and appropriate assistance for the non-priority homeless to which section 4 of the Act refers.

It is for local authorities to decide how to discharge the duty laid on them—whether to provide general advice, lists of agencies or accommodation or to secure or provide accommodation. As for the provision of council accommodation, the House will know that, under section 6 of the Act, authorities have a duty in the selection of council tenants to give "reasonable preference" to homeless people.

Figures for the first six months of 1984 show that about 9 per cent. of those for whom authorities secured accommodation under the Act were outside the priority need categories laid down in section 2.

It is for local authorities to decide how the homeless should be accommodated. The duty to secure accommodation can be met by placing people in private sector or housing association property, as well as in the council's own housing stock. In some cases — while they are making inquiries to determine the extent of their duty under the Act, when they are satisfied that the applicant is in priority need, but intentionally homeless, and while arranging for a transfer to another authority with whose area the applicant has a local connection—councils have a duty to provide temporary accommodation only. Here again it is for authorities to decide how to fulfil their duty, and our code of guidance makes a number of suggestions.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): The Minister cannot so easily pass responsibilities on to local authorities. Does he accept that it is impossible for them to provide all that is needed for the homeless, because of the huge cuts in housing investment programmes that have occurred under this Government?

The root of the problem is the dramatic rundown in local authority house building. It is not only better, but cheaper, to enable local authorities and other socially responsible agencies to provide proper, permanent accommodation than to pay through the nose to commercial landlords who provide squalid alternative accommodation in bed-and-breakfast establishments.

Mr. Gow: I shall be dealing with resources. I was reminding the House that responsibilities are laid on local authorities under the 1977 Act. It is up to local authorities, first, to discharge their statutory duty and, secondly, to determine their own priorities after we have made our HIP allocations. No one disagrees with the hon. Gentleman when he says that the resources available for housing are a material factor.

The suggestions in our code of guidance include the use of short-life council dwellings and the taking of a short-term lease on empty private sector property. It is a continuing scandal that 25,300 local authority-owned houses and flats hve been empty for more than 12 months. If some of those could be brought into use we would make a significant contribution to solving some of the problems that we are considering.

There will always be financial constraints. We would always like to be able to spend more on a range of socially desirable purposes. Because there will always be financial constraints, it is particularly important to ensure that the fullest use is made of all existing dwellings.

As the House knows, my Department has just completed a study of the problems of the 30 authorities with the most long-term empty dwellings, and we are taking action in two ways. First, I am extending the eligibility for housing association grant to short-life properties in local authority ownership.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): About time too.

Mr. Gow: I am glad to have the support of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). We have been considering taking such action and I believe that it will make a valuable contribution. The extension of the grant will enable housing associations to put local authority dwellings back into use. We are also making a grant to the empty property unit established by Shelter to further its work in providing advice and information to housing associations and others about the short-term use of empty property. Housing advice centres — the hon. Member for Tooting made this point—contribute to the fuller use of existing property by advising people about vacant accommodation or agencies which may be able to assist them. Many authorities provide useful help in that way.

I pay tribute to the dedicated people who work in the centres run by voluntary bodies and deal sympathetically and helpfully with a wide range of complex housing problems. We have recognised the value of the work done in the voluntary sector by giving grants to bodies operating at national and regional level. They include the London Housing Aid Centre and the Housing Advice Switchboard for the London area, the Shelter National Housing Aid Trust for many areas outside London, and, more recently, the Tyneside Housing Aid Centre, which covers the Houghton and Washington constituency.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I hope to raise in detail and quietly the problem of the Scots, often teenagers, who leave home, come to London under the illusion that they will find work, cannot do so and get into all sorts of difficulties.

Is it the Minister's impression that housing centres and voluntary bodies pay sufficient attention to such teenagers —from the north in general, and not just in Scotland— who arrive in London and get into difficulties, perhaps partly of their own making, which create endless problems? Does the Department have a view on that matter?

Mr. Gow: It is precisely to give help to those people, who are sometimes very young and may never have been outside Scotland before, that the advice centres exist. Some hon. Members will be familiar with the excellent work done by those centres and the sympathetic advice that is given. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has drawn our attention to an important subject.

I was describing the initiatives that the Government are taking. I shall be giving fresh advice to local authorities, describing the ways in which better management practices can reduce the number of empty dwellings. I shall be emphasising the scope for using short-life schemes and short-term lettings to bring empty properties back into use and to rehouse families accepted as homeless and others in the greatest housing need.

Our code of guidance under the 1977 Act makes it clear that, in securing accommodation for the homeless, local authorities should regard bed and breakfast very much as a last resort. I do not quarrel with some of the descriptions used by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington. Like other hon. Members, I have seen some of that accommodation myself. Even as a temporary expedient, it is unsatisfactory.

Homelessness is taken into account in deciding housing investment programme allocations. The Government recognise the increasingly serious problem of the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I have just approved a research project to be carried out by my Department. The results of that research will be available to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and to me. The project will include a survey of a sample of bed-and-breakfast landlords and the experience of those who live in that type of accommodation.

The Government share the concern that has been expressed by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington about houses in multiple occupation. Local authorities have extensive statutory powers governing means of escape from fire, which were strengthened by schedule 24 to the Housing Act 1980. Since December 1981, local authorities have been under a duty to exercise their powers to require the necessary means of escape from the largest HMOs, where the potential risk is greatest.

We have amended the Housing Act 1974 to enable special grant to be paid for means of escape from fire in HMOs, and for the payment of grant to be mandatory where work is required by notice under section 15 of the Housing Act 1961 for standard amenities, or under schedule 24. Through the Housing Act 1980, and the Criminal Justice Act 1982, we have increased fines for offences relating to houses in multiple occupation. Many of the increases have been substantial. In 1982 we issued a circular to housing and fire authorities in England and Wales giving guidance on the changes in the law and clarifying the scope of the statutory powers and responsibilities that authorities have for improving fire safety.

The powers available to local authorities are mostly discretionary, because the Government believe that each authority is best placed to apply these powers as it thinks fit, bearing in mind its specialised knowledge of the area and of the properties concerned. Section 70 of the Housing Act 1969 places a duty on local authorities to make inspections to see what action needs to be taken under the Housing Acts. Part II of the Housing Act 1961 and part IV of the Housing Act 1964 provide local authorities with discretionary powers to require improvements in the management and physical condition of HMOs. They can also require the provision of standard amenities, or alternatively limit the number of occupants. Local authorities can also make a control order, which allows them to take over the management of an HMO to protect the safety, welfare and health of those living there.

Some who live in HMOs may be tenants who are protected by the Rent Act 1977. In that case, they may have full security of tenure and be entitled to apply to the rent officer for a fair rent. Whether or not they are protected by the Rent Act, they are likely to be protected by the Protection from Eviction Act 1977. That Act prohibits harassment and illegal eviction of any tenants or licensees. However, I take very seriously some of the examples given by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, and I should be glad to discuss with him later the examples to which he drew the attention of the House. Indeed, I was grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing our attention to some very terrifying examples.

I remind the House that it is a criminal offence for anyone to turn a tenant out of his home without a court order, or to try to make him leave by intimidation or violence, or by withholding services such as gas or electricity. If a tenant considers that he is being harassed he should complain to his local authority, which has powers to prosecute under the Protection from Eviction Act.

I turn now to rented accommodation owned by local authorities. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asked about the resources available for public sector housing. In the coming financial year, total gross public sector housing provision will be £3,056 million. That is to say, it will be £65 million less than the target announced last year, but that is still a very substantial sum.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Minister may think that there is a "mere" reduction of £65 million on what was originally scheduled, but does he agree that that sum depends on estimates of considerably increased capital receipts for local authorities during the course of next year? Are not those expectations totally unrealistic?

Mr. Gow: The Government's estimates for the sale of council houses are the best that we can make. One can never be absolutely certain about the extent to which tenants will want to take advantage of the substantially more favourable terms introduced by the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, but the House will remember that the Labour party, and even, I think, the Liberal party — which is not represented in the Chamber today — voted against the 1984 Act.

In view of the criticisms made by the hon. Member for Tooting about the right to buy, I was particularly interested to notice that the Birmingham Post of Tuesday had the following headline:

"Labour Party pledge to sell council homes".

I congratulate the Labour party on its conversion. It is a long time since the Labour party began to tiptoe onto the middle ground of politics. Indeed, I welcome the excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), in which he promised that his party — which went into the last election pledged to repeal the right to buy — had now abandoned its pledge to repeal that provision. As time proceeds, I hope that Labour Members will be persuaded by the strength of our arguments, not only on home ownership, but on wider elements of denationalisation. I shall gladly give way to the hon. Member for Oldham, West if he wishes to comment on the Labour party's policy on council house sales.

Of course, part of the problem of housing is the condition of our housing stock. In a debate such as this it is relevant to remind hon. Members that in the year ended 31 March 1984 more than £900 million was spent on improvement and repair grants. Even in this financial year, our latest estimate is that some £700 million will be spent on improvement and repair grants. I remind the hon. Member for Oldham, West that in the last year of the Labour Administration that he adorned, total expenditure on improvement and repair grants was £90 million.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be announcing the housing investment programme allocations shortly. We are making a change in the method of making housing investment programme allocations which is related specifically to the problems of homelessness being debated today. The national total of resources is distributed using the generalised needs index. The index is also used, in part, for distribution to individual local authorities. One of the indicators in the index is the homelessness indicator, which takes up 10 per cent. of the total GNI. The indicator is based on the number of lettings to homeless households. In the past we have used the number of secure lettings for this indicator, but, following discussion with the local authority associations, for 1985-86 we will be including non-secure as well as secure lettings. This is a useful change in the methodology.

The motion refers to housing associations. I pay tribute to the enormous contribution that the voluntary housing movement has made, and continues to make, in meeting housing needs. Our acknowledgement of their contribution is reflected in our allocation to the Housing Corporation this year of £687 million. Our allocation for next year will, I hope, be announced at the same time as the housing investment programme allocation. In making our allocations we will take full account of the fact that the housing association movement provides good quality homes and manages and maintains them well, and that it caters for the special needs of the frail, elderly and disabled, as well as for single people, one-parent families and the homeless.

With the Housing Corporation, the housing association movement has been invaluable in taking up the challenge provided by our hostels initiative. Launched in 1980, that initiative has provided the first major expansion for many years in the provision of hostels and other forms of shared housing. Since the Government came to power, the Housing Corporation has approved accommodation of that type for more than 8,500 of those who are least able to help themselves. Much of that accommodation is for the single homeless, including the elderly.

Development finance is available for housing associations from the Housing Corporation. Where necessary, my Department pays deficit grants to meet the shortfall in housing running costs. The hostels initiative is something of which the Government have every reason to be proud. They have made a major contribution towards solving the real problems of homelessness.

The motion refers to board and lodging payments. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington will understand if I leave that matter for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. I hope to be in the House for almost all of the remainder of the debate. My hon. Friend will reply to the social security aspects. If hon. Members raise other housing matters, I shall, of course, write to them.

11.32 am

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I congratulate the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) both on his success in the ballot and on using this opportunity to highlight an extremely important problem. We are all concerned about the massive rise in the number of supplementary payment claimants in board and lodging and its cost. The figures provided by the Campaign for Single Homeless People show that the numbers of claimants in ordinary board and lodging has shot up from 41,000 in 1979 to an estimated 139,000 this year. The expenditure involved has risen from £52 million in 1979 to £380 million. The average payment has risen from £20·40 a week to £52·35.

Like other Members on the Opposition Benches, I object to the way in which the Government view the problem solely in financial terms — something to be sorted out through the social security system. Instead, they should be tackling the root causes of the problem — homelessness and the lack of appropriate housing provision. In recent years, the problem has been very much aggravated by the increase in unemployment, especially among young people, and by the increasing shortage of private rented accommodation.

I wish to concentrate my remarks on the problems of single people who, I believe, are most at risk. The 1981 census showed that there were more than 9 million lone adults in Britain of working age. Despite their aspirations, only about one third of them have a home of their own. Only 7 per cent. of council tenants are single people of working age. We know that a number of local authorities simply do not consider housing applications from single people. The shrinkage in the private rented sector has aggravated that problem considerably.

I understand the Government's case about abuses of the social security system. However, what the Government are doing—and they do it so often—in trying to tackle the general problem of abuse is to create real hardship for genuine cases. The idea of a reduction in payment levels for 16 and 17-year-olds seems to be based on the idea that young people deliberately leave their homes in order to claim benefit. That is nothing but a myth. The great majority of young people in temporary accommodation, or those who are potentially homeless, are staying with friends or relations. That trend is growing. It has become unusual at my Friday surgery not to have one young person coming to me because he is homeless. He might have been turned out by his parents because of overcrowding or a family row. The family may have moved away from London and the young person is left high and dry. The youngsters sometimes sleep in cars or sleep rough but, more often than not, they sleep on floors at the homes of friends and relations until their welcome is worn out. That is a subjective judgment, but it is borne out by some expert assessment.

The Minister referred to the Housing Advice Switchboard, which provides help for single homeless people in London. I am proud to be a sponsor of that body. It collects statistics about those who contact it for advice. Last year 980 young people under the age of 18 contacted it for advice. Of those, 43 per cent. were already homeless, 25 per cent. were in temporary accommodation and 15 per cent. expected to be made homeless within a month. Of the latter two categories, 75 per cent. were staying with friends or relatives, only 10 per cent. were with their parents, 6 per cent. were in hostels and 6 per cent. in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. Those figures have increased during the past three years. The trend is clearly towards young people staying with friends or relations. There is no evidence in London of a massive abuse of the benefit system by young homeless people.

I was concerned by the suggestion that boarders who are outside what is known as their usual DHSS office area would receive payments for only two to four weeks if unemployed and without children. That suggests that those people need only a short time to sort out their affairs. A survey by the Housing Advice Switchboard of 9,000 people of all ages in the London area showed how permanent "temporary" accommodation can be. Of those in temporary accommodation, almost 45 per cent. had been there for between two years and three years, and 26 per cent.—more than a quarter—had been there for four years or more.

I endorse what the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington said about furniture grants. All too often it becomes a Catch-22. Claimants who, at last, have found their way out of temporary accommodation into perhaps a permanent unfurnished home provided by the local authority or a housing association, then discover a whole new bureaucratic minefield that they must negotiate. I know of a gentleman in his fifties in my constituency who was in bed-and-breakfast accommodation for 11 years. He at last found a small unfurnished flat through a housing association. He thought that at last his problems were solved. He went to the DHSS and asked only for a bed and a cooker—a very modest request. He was met with the response that he must demonstrate and prove that there was not adequate furnished accommodation in the area that he could take up, instead of becoming a tenant in unfurnished accommodation in his own right. Much public money could be saved by that one individual move, when the Department of Health and Social Security is paying out over £50 a week for bed-and-breakfast accommodation and meals out. Less than half that amount would be involved in someone living in a home of his own.

I should like to recount one other personal experience showing just what can happen to young single people who are homeless. A hostel was established in my constituency in a former doctor's surgery acquired by the Department of Transport in advance of the east London river crossing road scheme. The hostel was at 291 Plumstead high street. After the Department acquired it, two individuals produced a scheme for a hostel for young homeless men. In February 1983, planning permission was given by the London borough of Greenwich for a group home for six homeless boys which opened in the middle of 1983. Earlier this year I started to receive considerable complaints from residents about noise, rowdiness, vandalism and break-ins, and the police were involved regularly.

My investigations revealed that the Department had not been paid a penny piece in rent and was owed about £5,000 in rent by the operators of the hostel. My investigations established from former residents of the hostel that there were major complaints of overcrowding. There was planning permission for up to six people, but sometimes 15 were resident in the hostel. There were complaints of glue sniffing, drug taking and all sorts of crime. There was no supervision of the hostel. Although the residents paid for an evening meal, it was served at 4.30 in the afternoon, and if a resident was not present he did not get it.

I then discovered that the DHSS had been referring people to the hostel and paying £50 a week for that service. I established from the local office that that was correct. The manager told me in a letter dated 26 November that in March 1984 the charge for bed and breakfast and an evening meal had increased from £36 a week to £50 a week. With the other allowances made to those resident at the hostel, a total of £68·85 a week was being paid to residents. The manager told me frankly that it was not the responsibility of the DHSS to check that that was an appropriate place for young people. The Department's job is simply to ensure that the money is paid to the young people. In this case, the charges were paid by the young people, but unfortunately those who ran the hostel did not think it appropriate to go on paying their rent to the Department of Transport. As a result the hostel suddenly closed in November and it is reputed that another is opening up somewhere else in south London.

In that case there was no supervision by the DHSS and no check on whether that was an appropriate place for young people. There was no supervision or investigation by the London borough of Greenwich, although its planning stipulations had been massively exceeded. What is most worrying is the fact that young people were being put at risk and thousands of pounds of public money was being spent on what I can charitably describe only as an extremely inferior service.

All of us must recognise that the problems of single homelessness, particularly of young people, are increasing not just in the inner cities where they have been a traditional problem, but throughout our major towns and cities. We shall solve the problem not by altering the operation of the benefits system, but only by providing more appropriate housing for single people at rents that they can afford. That would enable single people to do what they want — live independently and in some dignity. As other hon. Members have said, that would be a much better investment, providing better value for money than what the Government are now doing in funding bed-and-breakfast accommodation and similar accommodation.

I welcome the steps that the Minister announced in his speech. They were useful as far as they went in terms of tackling the scandal of empty local authority property and helping effective advice services. However, what the Minister said falls far short of what is needed. Local authorities and housing associations need more financial encouragement to enable them to undertake the specific housing programme directed at single people. Unless we tackle the problem with determination, the scandal of single homelessness will go on haunting us for many years to come.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on securing the debate. I enjoyed the speech by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who always speaks with great strength of feeling on this subject, although sometimes with rather one-sided logic.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that no one in the community should be without a roof over his head, warmth and food. We are all united about that. The problem comes when either side of the House becomes so taken with one side as to ignore the other. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington was very anti-landlord. I am very pro-landlord, although not all landlords. We need more landlords and a bigger rented sector so that people can get homes and there is mobility of labour.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction used marvellous, magic words in saying that it is our job to look after the genuinely homeless. Nobody contests that for a second. The genuinely homeless must be looked after. However, I have seen and I know the abuses. If the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington does not believe that they exist, he can join my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) or come to Ilfracombe or Barnstaple in my part of the world and see those abuses, which are perpetrated by both sides of the set-up, on the one side by the bad landlord, and on the other by young people whom we are forcing—I mean forcing—to become pensioners of the state in their youth. I fear that many will remain pensioners of the state throughout their adult life, into old age and when they go beyond, to whatever happens then.

The present system of benefit is well intentioned, well meaning, but oh so vast that only one or two voluntary organisations ever seem able to interpret the various rules and regulations, which make it virtually impossible for a young person of limited skills to secure and be able to afford to take up gainful employment.

On occasions such as this, it is a habit to talk about what is happening in our constituencies. I shall give two simple examples. A young lady was offered a position in a business with which I am connected—the shopkeeping business. She wished to take it, but said that the basic salary was not enough to cover the benefit now that she had left home of her own free will. It was a good home, reasonably prosperous—I know it—but because she had left it the total benefit for that young girl of 18, who was reasonably qualified, was about £61 net per week. To get that amount one has to earn about £100 gross. Alas, £100 gross is not earned by a junior shop worker, certainly not in the depressed west country. That is the first problem, of the person who wants to work.

My second example concerns someone a few years older, a panel beater, who was offered a job at £125 a week, which, in our part of the world, is not a bad basic weekly wage. His problem was that he had a wife and two children and had been unemployed for some time. He would have been worse off in work than out of work.

A debate such as this gives us the opportunity to ask where we are going wrong when, with the best will in the world, both sides wish to help, but, alas, people in the Opposition, such as the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, say that all the folly and all the fault is on one side. The hon. Gentleman said that there are no scroungers. I say that, unfortunately, there are too many. He said that there are bad landlords. I agree, but there are also good ones. We must find the balance.

I should like to reverse the normal procedure and give my conclusions first, while my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing Construction is still here, on some of the things that we need to change. Then, in the best Reader's Digest tradition, I shall give some potted—though I trust not potty—arguments on why those changes should be made.

We need a fresh definition of houses in multiple occupation and of common lodging houses. We need to amend existing planning law to control the vast increase in the number of so-called houses in multiple occupation. We need a definition of the regulations so that we can enforce control of houses in multiple occupation. The abuses are vast.

Something must be done in the DHSS to give incentives, to young single claimants in particular, to remain within their family units. It is lunacy to encourage young people to ask the state for rent payment when they have a safe, secure and happy home in which they could remain.

We must give local authorities powers to set locally determined limits. A maximum for London inevitably becomes the limit elsewhere, where the costs are different. As a result, all rents go up. It is easier to attract a young unemployed person to a property than it is to attract a working tenant who cannot afford £60 a week rent. People at all levels in my part of the world cannot afford such a sum.

Savings can be made. We should extend rent legislation to include HMOs and common lodging houses. We should help housing associations, non-profit-making charitable organisations and local authorities to widen the choice of single accommodation for the young single person and for older widows, widowers and divorcees. We must organise better inspections of lodging house accommodation before vast sums are handed over to them.

Like other constituencies, mine has the advantage of having good voluntary and self-help organisations. They help hon. Members irrespective of party politics. The North Devon Inter Agency Group is a wonderful organisation set up recently by Councillor Mrs. Fay Webber, the chairman of the North Devon district council housing committee. She was disturbed by her experience as a Barnstaple district councillor of the sheer extravagance in spending forced by national Government on local government. Local government has no say—it must pay.

The group comprises district and county councillors, rent officers, social service officers, members of the community health council, the police, probation officers and others with community and youth interests. They voluntarily give their time to the incredible problems that they encounter. The North Devon health authority also assists these good people. One of the problems is caused by young people leaving their parental home and claiming social security benefit to supplement their independent self-chosen life style. In Barnstaple and Ilfracombe, ghetto-like accommodation is emerging as a result.

One might say that that is all right if that is what a young person wants to do. The state says that someone must pay, but I cannot accept that. It infuriates working people to see gross abuses of taxpayers' and ratepayers' money. Local aggravation is considerable. It is no surprise that in my area the police encounter frequent problems between landlords or tenants and local working people who are struggling to make ends meet. They are annoyed at the fairly extravagant life style of those who claim to be unemployed and unable to obtain employment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North talked about the availability of jobs. There are job problems in most parts of the country, but jobs are available, here in London for example, in the catering industry. I have an interest in that industry, and I know that the major firms have a problem in finding staff at the lower levels. Why cannot they find people? It is the same old story. People find that it is not worth taking such a job because their totted-up benefit makes it unwise and worthless to work a 36-hour or 40-hour week for an extra pound or two.

Probation officers say that some young people with jobs cannot find accommodation either because the folk without jobs have taken it or because they cannot afford it. Rents are forced up and social problems arise.

I do not seek to exonerate the bad landlords, but, for goodness sake, let us look across the board and consider what we politicians have done to force upon authorities the obligation to do certain things which they would not otherwise do, although they are good and caring. The people at the grass roots know more about what happens locally than we do.

I do not want to burden the House when so many other hon. Members wish to speak. The problem is straightforward. The housing stock in my area is being run down. The older stock is over-occupied, the fire hazards are vast, as are the improvement grants. We must check to ensure that people do not exploit the system so that they receive vast sums to spend on their property. We must ensure that people do not extract large sums from tenants who could not care less how high the rents are, since someone else pays them.

Local authorities have to pay the rates for such accommodation and the water authority receives its rates from the local authority. Who pays the local authority? It seems that central Government pay less and less, while local government pays more and more.

Rateable values are low in many parts of the country, and rate income is therefore low. Areas such as north Devon do not seek to be mean or parsimonious to those who are less fortunate than those who have jobs. We must look to the future. People outside the House and outside politics, as they watch us go about our work, do not understand why we put yet more burdens on people who are willing to bear them, and then we do not provide the finance.

I am sorry if I have been slow in my delivery. This morning I ran over my National Health Service spectacles. Fortunately, I was not wearing them at the time. It means, since I come from a family originally named Kelly, that I am today one-eyed Riley. I apologise for taking the time of the House in a winking and blinking fashion.

I appreciate what my hon. Friend the Minster for Housing and Construction seeks to do. The Government are trying to make the system more sensible and logical. We are always pasting up another three or four pages of amendments to attach to legislation. Would it not be nice to have a bonfire of all the books and start again with a small charter based upon the belief that nobody should ever be without a roof, without warmth and without food? We should try to find ways of providing that more simply and at less cost.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This is not the occasion on which to make simplistic political points. I had the good fortune to go to Barnstaple in the constituency of the hon. Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 21 November to speak to the Barnstaple constituency Labour party. I know of the problems experienced in the west country. The hon. Gentleman used the phrase, "pensioners of the state in their youth". I hope that he will bring pressure to bear on his Government to do something about it and also about local authorities' worries about central Government.

Barnstaple is a beautiful place, and north Devon is a beautiful place, but I must turn my attention to the north. I am concerned about the boys and girls—for such they often are—about the young men and young women who come to London, not only from Scotland, but from the north of England, too, as my hon. Friend the member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), to whom I am grateful for initiating this debate, knows.

The United Kingdom is becoming two separate countries. The Minister for Housing and Construction represents Eastbourne. One must travel a long way from Eastbourne before one reaches the nearest Labour constituency. Equally, there is no Conservative Member of Parliament in the Greater Glasgow conurbation. That is a sign of the fact that north and south are becoming two different worlds.

The Scots have traditionally always come to London, but they are now doing so often in circumstances of despair. The problem has been chronicled by the Sunday Mail and the Sunday Post, but I eschew relying on press stories. I would rather talk from my personal knowledge and experience and from what I hear from my constituents and the parents of my constituents, and at my surgeries.

The young people from Scotland, the north of England and Tyneside are subject to financial exploitation. They are sometimes subject to sexual exploitation. They are sometimes subject to enforced sharing. Sometimes, not in the first place through their own will, they become enmeshed in criminal activities—sucked into them.

The parents of those children are often horrified and shattered. It is difficult to convey the heartbreak of some parents—good-living people—who had thought that it would never happen to them and that a child of theirs would ever leave the family home in resentment and go down to London. The departure is often the fag end of a tiff in the family home. Given the economic pressures and the strains of unemployment, such quarrels break out more and more frequently. Young people arriving in London find it far harder to get work than they had imagined. Some go to the DHSS for advice. I wonder whether the Under-Secretary is satisfied with the advice given by his Department to young people from Scotland and the north. I believe that some offices, and some individual officers, are extremely good and caring and take a great deal of trouble, but, as so often, everything depends on the people involved. There is no universal standard.

What general guidance is sent out to DHSS officers to help them to deal with youngsters who are often inadequate and who are almost always very vulnerable? If they do not become involved in drugs they may become involved in prostitution, and if they do not become involved in prostitution they may be caught up in crime. They are very often naive, if not innocent. They need help.

The young people's intention may have been only to visit London. The difficulty is that they find it embarrassing, once difficulties have set in, to go home. In reality there may be no need for them to be embarrassed, but that does not help much.

We need to be more strongly influenced by the medieval idea of sanctuary and of rendering help. A stitch in time never saved nine so truly as in such situations. I do not want to point to a particular church, but in my own experience Roman Catholic priests are often extremely good at coping with such situations. I also have the highest regard for the work of the Salvation Army. Many Salvation Army officers are latter-day saints in the best sense. They go to endless trouble to try to contact the young people's homes.

The Minister referred to hostel initiatives. I wonder whether enough is done to persuade young people who arrive at hostels that they would be welcome if they returned home. Very often young people arriving at a hostel say, "Whatever you do, don't contact my mum and dad," and the hostel does not do so. This is a delicate matter—the young people involved may be 18 or 19 years old—but I believe that, in the case of those who can be considered to be children, the adults involved in the case should contact the home. The parable of the "prodigal son" was never more relevant.

Between 1965 and 1967 I was Parliamentary Private Secretary to the late Dick Crossman in Housing and between 1968 and 1970 in the DHSS. In those days a great deal of attention was paid to this problem, even though it was not nearly as serious as it is now. Great civil servants such as Sir George Godber, Dame Evelyn Sharpe, Dame Muriel Riddelsdell and others devoted their time to this problem. I do not believe that their successors care any less about it, but I should like some explanation of the Government's policy on what additional help could be given to these unfortunate youngsters.

Even at the very simplest level, that of cost, failing to take action will prove very costly to society. In this matter, we are our brother's keeper. However, even if one does not accept the moral necessity, one must accept that we would save a great deal through the avoidance of potential crime—I do not speak of the potential unhappiness that could be averted—by doing something at an early stage.

I promised my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that I would be brief. However, I must say that a great deal more could be done for the construction industry in the north. I know that the Minister has no responsibility for Scottish housing, but this is once again a question of public expenditure. The extra cost of a proper and much-needed house building programme, over and above what is spent out of the oil revenues on unemployment benefit, would not be very great. Construction workers would come from recipients of unemployment benefit.

Ministers from the south of England live in a very different world from people in the north. It is not my intention to sneer at them. This morning, however, until the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Mr. Lennox-Boyd) arrived, the Front Bench had been peopled entirely by hon. Members representing the south of England. Southerners have responsibilities towards people in the north. They would not get very far without the tankers which every eight hours or so—I can see them from my study window in my constituency—set off from Mound Point at Queensferry to take North sea oil to Korea, Japan and other countries. The south has an obligation to the north, which produces the oil revenues.

The United Kingdom is one country. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and I may disagree about many other matters, but we share a certain history on the question of devolution, and we both believe that this is one country. I am not simply beating a Scottish or northern drum. I am very much alarmed about the way in which the country is being polarised.

No speech from me would be complete without reference not just to the north but to the south Atlantic. I shall do no more than draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Brewster houses have so far cost £6·3 million, or £120,000 per house. Twenty-one of them are unoccupied.

I do not wish to abuse the debate, so I simply point out that defence expenditure is running amok. Perhaps just a little of the money that is spent on defence could be given to solve these urgent problems and to help the construction industry, which is the root of much of the problem. If there were homes and jobs in the building industry, not so many people from the north of England and Scotland would come south.

Like many others, I walk home from the House at night. I have to report that, going up Horseferry road, which is within eight minutes of the Chamber, I occasionally see a man who sleeps out. I once poked him because I thought that he was very ill—in fact he was just asleep. Like many others, he sleeps under the arches. Some of us might pass by and feel like the Biblical Levite, but it is the personal observation of those of us who walk home from the House that there are far more people out on the streets and without homes than there have been in the previous 20 years during which we have had the privilege to be hon. Members. My observation is that the problems that my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington has raised are growing.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) for enabling us to express our anxieties about issues which certainly worry my constituents. East Kent has witnessed the exploitation of a system which is designed to help people in need. Many of my constituents are sure that that system is being manipultated and abused by the greedy.

In regard to east Kent, we are not discussing houses in multiple occupation in back streets, although there are some, but the use of prime site seaside hotels which have been converted to DHSS hostels. Those hotels have been advertised in the press in east London, the midlands and Liverpool. The advertisements entice young people to the area, saying that their rail fares will be paid and, in one case, that there is a taxi service from the hotel to the DHSS office. That means that the young people can collect their benefit and, more importantly, that the landlord can ensure that he collects their benefit. That is not what the system was designed for.

The going rate for full board in these hotels is about £65 a week. The Margate hotel and guest house association tells me that it can provide clean, decent and comfortable accommodation and good food in many of its smaller hotels, as it does for visitors throughout the south, for £45 a week. I must therefore tell my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security that the going rate for Dover, which is likely to be listed at £60 a week, is far too high. There is a considerable profit margin. I know that an offer of £200,000 was made for a 14-bedroomed sea front hotel in my constituency, with a view to converting it into a DHSS hostel. The offer consisted of £170,000 on mortgage — there was no money up front—and £30,000 in cash in two years' time. It is not difficult to work out who would pay the £30,000 cash—the taxpayer.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) about planning law requiring serious and urgent consideration. Officers in Thanet district council have examined it to see whether they can exercise any control over the abuse. They have found it extremely difficult because it is difficult to establish whether a seaside hotel has been turned into a house in multiple occupation. That problem is exacerbated when it is possible to rotate the tenants around different hotels so that they appear not to be in long-stay accommodation. As they are technically in short-stay accommodation, the hostel is still a hotel. I must observe, with all due respect to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, that housing legislation is being ignored in regard to the enforcement of any form of quality control.

Abuse of the system is especially serious in seaside constituencies such as mine where we are trying to revitalise our tourist trade. The east Kent economic development group is working hard to create new jobs in tourism and to attract new industry. To do that, we need the seed corn of our tourist business—our prime site hotels. We have too many small guest houses and hotels which provide too low a standard of accommodation. It would be good if we could encourage the conversion of some of those properties into holiday or long-stay flats to be made available in the private rented sector. One of the causes of the problem is the shortage of private rented accommodation. It is not that the accommodation does not exist but that successive rent legislation, despite the Government's attempt to encourage letting through the introduction of the shorthold lease, has resulted in much privately rented accommodation simply not being made available.

Is there scrounging and is the system being abused? Housing benefit provisions allow benefit to be paid when people move from one part of the country to another for a good reason, such as looking for a job. We are trying to create employment in east Kent. I hope and believe that we shall. I also hope that east Kent, which is a prime corner of England and which is closer to the continent than any other part, will have employment to offer to young people such as those who are represented by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and others. At the moment, however, we are faced with 24 per cent. male unemployment. Our overall unemployment rate is 19 per cent.

It cannot be right for most of the people who are being enticed to the south-east, I believe cruelly, to believe that they are looking for jobs. Some hotels offer them a choice. Either they can take full board or they can pay rent, take cash, and find their own food. Some of the costs of rent provided to the DHSS include beer money, which is on credit at bars which are kept open late into the night. In other cases, which are currently being investigated by the police in regard to fraud, some people are living on social benefits while employed as painters and decorators in the black economy. I hope that every hon. Member will agree that that is not what the benefits system was designed for and, therefore that it is right for us to address ourselves to the level and manner in which benefit is paid.

To demonstrate the point about the desire for employment, may I point out that I wrote on 26 November to two proprietors of the sort of hotels about which I have spoken. I said:

> "I would also like at this stage to ask you to be kind enough to indicate to any of your present tenants, who are now technically my constituents, to make contact with me with a view to the provision of employment. While I, like the Jobcentre, do not have a magic wand, I am more than willing to assist anyone who is reasonably willing to assist themselves. I would be grateful if they could be advised to telephone our office . . . for a suitable appointment: In view of the numbers involved I propose to make special arrangements to see any tenant so inclined rather than to overwhelm a normal surgery morning."

In other words, I offered an opportunity for people to attend a special surgery for the sole purpose of endeavouring to establish the type of employment that they were seeking, and to assist them to find it. I am sure that all hon. Members would have sought to do that. The offer was also carried in the local press. I received replies from children of my constituents asking for help, but I did not receive a single reply from anyone receiving DHSS benefit and staying in one of those hotels. Therefore, I question whether there is a serious search for work.

I welcome the measures that my right hon. and hon. Friends have taken, which seek to help those in genuine need. I agree with the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington that we must have controls enshrined in legislation for the inspection and registration of establishments which accommodate people receiving DHSS benefit. The level of payment should be established in exactly the same way as that from the public purse for private rented accommodation — that is, by the rent officer. We should know the standard of accommodation and food that is being provided and, therefore, what a reasonable rent and rate for the service is. At the moment people are paying through the nose for substandard accommodation. It is a racket and it must be stopped.

A matter not yet touched on but of considerable anxiety to my constituents and to my hon. Friends who represent seaside constituencies is the subject of board and lodging payments for old people in what are euphemistically called rest homes, nursing homes and mental after-care homes. There are both good and bad homes. I have many honourable examples of first-rate homes in my constituency. However, I am ashamed to say that there are also far too many bad ones.

In a town in my constituency a hotel describes itself as a holiday hotel for gentlefolk. A DHSS resident from inland was referred to it for a holiday and found it to be a mental after-care home. So serious was that that a constituent's child was chased up the road by a resident, and a bicycle was thrown through a front window, the glass from which nearly blinded his sister. The resident was taken to a local institution where he was diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenic and subsequently released back to the same sort of home. That is disgraceful.

The rate in east Kent for a rest home is £129 a week. That is the maximum and has immediately become the minimum. I am told by friends who run rest homes that it is possible and proper to provide a good service, accommodation, facilities and food for £80 a week and still make a profit. A great deal of money is swilling around in the pockets of people who are patently not earning it. We must address ourselves to the provision of attendance allowance and determine that, if it is to be paid, it should be paid for genuine attendance. Anyone who runs a rest home can quickly claim the best part of £29 a week per resident in return for virtually nothing.

There is a genuine need to determine that those providing care in rest homes and nursing homes have a minimum standard of care training, and that everyone employed in such homes is registered and trained before attendance allowance is paid. At the moment the system is being milked.

We should spend less. The public purse has a right to value for money. At the moment it is not getting it. We can save considerable sums in this area. That money would be infinitely better spent on providing back-up services through our excellent district nursing services to allow people to be cared for, not as cabbages in institutions, but in the community where they belong. We are throwing that opportunity away because we are wasting scarce resources.

I welcome the fact that the new regulations that govern the operation of such homes will come into force on 1 January. I hope that they will be stringently enforced. If that means closing those homes, they should be closed. The state and the beneficiaries of such care should get genuine value for money, care, rest and comfort. A high standard can be provided, but to do so we must eliminate the greedy, encourage the dedicated, and use the savings to improve the support services.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I should like warmly to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on his choice of subject for debate and on the moving and feeling manner in which he introduced it. As hon. Members will be aware, my hon. Friend had considerable professional experience of this subject before his election to the House. His passion, eloquence and carefully researched argument all bore witness to that.

I am sure that all hon. Members will agree that this subject is of critical importance to the distressingly fast escalating numbers of homeless, unemployed, and vulnerable — young people in particular — trapped in despair because of the deprivation of home and job. Over the years, my hon. Friend has conscientiously fought for the interests of such groups. His speech brought to the forefront of public attention those who are all too easily forgotten but whose needs are desperate and not of their own making. I pay him the warmest tribute for that.

The cruellest aspect of the debate is that, 11 days before Christmas, which is normally identified with families, security, warmth and reconciliation, we are debating changes in board and lodging allowances which will increase homelessness, divide families and worsen the living conditions of some of the poorest, most deprived and most vulnerable members of our society.

The Government's case is that overall expenditure on board and lodging allowances has escalated uncontrollably over the past five years and must, therefore, be sharply reined back. There are two reasons why that is an unjustified and callous response. One is that the Government have largely caused the problem. The second is that the substantial rise in expenditure is the result not, as has been suggested, of extravagance or malingering but of the remorseless rise in the number of people caught in the trap of homelessness which is not of their own making.

On the first count, we indict the Government as the cause of the problem because the numbers living in board-and-lodging accommodation have risen for two fundamental reasons: first, unemployment has soared, especially long-term unemployment among young people; secondly, the general shortage of rented accommodation has forced single people and families into lodgings. There is a shortage of rented accommodation because the Government have made enormous cuts in housing investment since 1979. Those huge, swingeing cuts amounting to a staggering reduction of 40 per cent. in real terms have run into hundreds if not thousands of millions of pounds in the past five years.

The other reason why we indict the Government is that, so far from the increase in costs being the result of abuse, the overwhelming cause is the relentless and terrifying rise over the past five years in the number of people driven into board-and-lodging accommodation. The figures have been quoted but I shall give them again. They have risen, according to Government handouts, from 41,000 in 1979 to 139,000 in 1984—an annual increase of 28 per cent.

There have been some suggestions in the debate that the rise in expenditure was due primarily to the sharp increase in charges. The Government's own press releases, however, show that average payments over the past five years have risen by 17 per cent. a year which is much lower than the increase of 28 per cent. in the number of claimants. It is significant that the increase since the new limits were introduced a year ago is estimated to be about 9 per cent. only. That is a relatively smaller increase than the increase in charges.

The problem is not caused by an excessive or unreasonable rise in payments; it is caused by the remorseless and frightening rise in the number of people deprived of a home by the dramatic collapse of house building by local authorities due to the Government's huge cuts in housing investment.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Is it not a fact that between 1979 and 1984 the average payment per claimant increased from £20·40 to £52·35 per week? That is two and a half times more and is staggeringly more than inflation.

Mr. Meacher: Of course it is an increase. We have all seen those figures. Although there has been a significant increase—greater than the rate of inflation—that is not the cause of what the Government call an uncontrollable rise in overall expenditure on board-and-lodging payments. The real cause in the increase in the numbers who have been driven by homelessness into board-and-lodging accommodation and bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

I shall press the charge against the Government even further. While the number of people in hostels and common lodging houses has remained fairly static over the past five years, there has been a huge rise in the number of people in board-and-lodging accommodation which is almost entirely due to the increased use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation. Such accommodation is used as a last resort by the increasing number of homeless single people. They live in this form of temporary accommodation not because they wish to but simply because they cannot obtain access to any form of ordinary permanent housing. That lies at the root of this problem. I repeat that it is the Government's wilful and destructive chopping of housing investment by nearly a half that is wreaking such a crucial penalty of homelessness, hardship and danger this Christmas.

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman has failed to take account in the wrong statistics that he is quoting of the extent to which it has been possible to finance the Government's housing policy as a result of the sale of council houses. If one takes that into account, public sector investment in housing fell by 17 per cent. in cost terms between 1979-80 and 1983-84. On the same basis, when the Labour party was in power between 1974-75 and 1978-79, expenditure fell by 45 per cent.

Mr. Dalyell: That is not new investment.

Mr. Meacher: As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has said so correctly, the transfer of ownership is not new investment. That is the crucial point. There has been a cut in the housing budget—and the Minister will confirm this—from £5 billion in 1979 to approximately £3 billion this year. That is a colossal cut, and the human misery that all hon. Members see every week in their surgeries is testimony to the consequences of that.

That will be the fate of up to approximately 50,000 of our fellow citizens this Christmas. Far too often, conditions in bed-and-breakfast accommodation provide no security, practically no privacy and thoroughly inadequate amenities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington said so powerfully. In the worst cases, people are forced to endure squalor that every hon. Member would agree is intolerable. There is overcrowding and risk of death or injury from defective fire precautions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington beat me to the quotation of what happened in Camden. There have been many lethal fires and one such, which was little noticed, was the one in Camden a little over a month ago. It was nothing spectacular, and very little notice was taken of it at the time. It was just one cheap bed-and-breakfast establishment going up in flames. The fire was at 46 Gloucester place, a property owned by London Lets. Three persons suffocated in a top room. They had been housed there by Camden council, which estimated that the cost of housing people in such places was £280 a week. I repeat the comment made by one Camden councillor, that even death traps, it would appear, are not necessarily cheap.

Scandals such as this cry out for far more regulation of lodging houses and far greater protection of those who are forced to use them. However, the Government's new board-and-lodging allowances will bring about exactly the opposite. Single people aged 16 or 17 could have their benefit cut immediately. Other unemployed claimants could have their benefit cut after two to four weeks unless the DHSS officers accept that they are claiming at their normal local office, however that is defined. I hope that the Minister will help us on that point. Families with children could face cuts after an unspecified time, and all these measures will come on top of the effects of the imposition of national limits on board-and-lodging payments.

What these effects mean can be shown by the survey done by Shelter—I am sure that other hon. Members have been supplied with a copy of the report — into hotels in seven areas of the south-east of England. In a letter to me, Shelter said:

"less than half the hotels contacted would take homeless people with children and the average cost of bed and breakfast for a couple with two children under 11 was £156·29 per week. If the Government's proposed regulation changes come into effect, the maximum amount payable to the family would be £133·80 a week. After the family had used their personal allowance to pay the difference, they would only have £2·21 per week to pay for meals and all other expenses."

That is the meaning of what we are discussing.

Homeless people without children will have to try to find accommodation in the area in which they became homeless. With the Government insisting on the requirement to return to "the normal office area", they are reviving the practice of parish relief of the Elizabethan Poor Law era whereby the poor were hounded from parish to parish until they were eventually forced to return to their place of origin. We are seeing exactly the same process today. The terminology is modern. No longer do we talk about parishes. We now talk about the normal benefit office area.

Perhaps worst of all under the new regulations is that the lower cost ceilings mean that accommodation at a price that homeless people can afford will be scarcer. It will be of a low standard. Abundant evidence has been produced in the debate to show that to be true. Sharing rooms with strangers will be inevitable.

The DHSS suggests that claimants without children should look for cheaper accommodation in other areas. At the same time, it is restricting payments to boarders outside their normal office areas after two to four weeks. This seemingly unnoticed contradiction is just one illustration of the confused and inadequate thinking underlying these proposals.

Before the end of the consultation period on 28 December—which in any event is much too short a time —I hope that the Government, in the light of today's debate, will seriously think again of the appalling misery that these new measures will bring about for some of the most helpless and innocent victims in society.

These proposals will save the Government money, but at what a cost! For those at present in lodgings, hotels and bed-and-breakfast establishments the Government's saving will mean increased overcrowding, slum conditions, squatting and in some cases even sleeping rough in the streets. People will have to choose, after these regulations, between a bed and a meal. There will not be money for both, as the example supplied by Shelter demonstrates. These proposals will deny to those in lodgings the basic right even to a minimum decent existence.

In my view, what makes all this so much more tragic and very much more deplorable is that these cuts in allowances for the homeless are being imposed by the Government at the same time as the Prime Minister delivers herself of an unequivocal commitment to maintian mortgage interest tax relief, even when it benefits the rich disproportionately and inequitably. It is all the more deplorable when cuts are being imposed on poor and homeless claimants with scarcely a murmur from the parliamentary Conservative party — indeed, we have heard acclamation from some Government supporters. Only two weeks ago they were in uproar about the proposals for the relatively smaller cuts in education grants for the children of rich parents.

Mr. Gow: Since the hon. Gentleman has now ventured into fiscal policy and is critical of the Government about tax relief on mortgage interest, perhaps he will say what is his party's policy towards tax relief on mortgage interest.

Mr. Meacher: I believe that we should reduce mortgage interest relief at the higher rates. That money is exclusively concentrated on the rich and, by any standards, it is totally unjustified when at the same time the Government seek to make savings by hitting exclusively at some of the poorest.

The Government's role this Christmas will be remembered not for any spirit of compassion or reconciliation, which generally all Governments have managed in the past at Christmas time, but for a rancorous and hard-nosed spitefulness towards some of the most vulnerable and needy groups. This Christmas the Government are knocking £1 off the supplementary benefit of some of the poorest pensioners with heating allowances. They are knocking an extra £1 a week off the already severely depleted supplementary benefit for the families and children of striking miners. They are now cutting the allowances for the homeless which will undoubtedly lead to some of the unemployed and the homeless being thrown on the streets. I hope that the Government, in the smug and pauchily self-satisfied form of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, are well satisfied with the savings that will be made by these cutbacks in board-and-lodging allowances at an execrable cost in human suffering.

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman has destroyed his case by massive overstatement. Perhaps he would confirm, since he is talking about generosity at Christmas time, that he was a member of a Government who in two years failed to pay the Christmas bonus.

Mr. Meacher: What matters to pensioners is——

Mr. Gow: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that?

Mr. Meacher: Since the Minister has raised the matter, the fact is that during the five years that we were in government the value of the pension rose by 20 per cent. in real terms. For a married couple it would be £5 per week higher today than it is if this Government when they first took office had not broken the link with earnings in the uprating of the pension. The huge increases for pensioners which were given by the Labour Government have been denied by this Government. The hon. Gentleman should look at his facts.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): Since the hon. Gentleman has referred to the impact of his Government's policies on pensioners, does he also take into account, and will he allow pensioners to take into account, the impact of the huge inflation which his Government launched upon pensioners' incomes and pensioners' economies?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman has clearly not got his feet under the table, following his shift from the Foreign Office. When we refer to "real terms" we mean that even after the increase in inflation there was an increase of 20 per cent. for pensioners under the Labour Government. Under this Government the increase is about 1 or 2 per cent. Under the Labour Government pensioners secured a massively higher benefit than they have secured under this Government.

This is not the way to deal with the intensely bitter and harsh problems of homelessness. The only satisfactory answer to the worsening scandal of often poor and sometimes appallingly squalid bed-and-breakfast accommodation is to guarantee the right to a decent, secure home. What is fundamentally at fault is the huge cut in housing investment, and the enormous rundown in local authority house building.

In his speech the Minister said that it was a matter of resources. We agree that it is a matter of resources. The Minister made great play of the fact that there has been a cut in the housing investment programme of "only"—that was the Minister's word—£65 million. No doubt the Minister wishes to take credit for the fact that had it not been for him the cut might have been larger. I give him credit for that. But that is not the point. The point is that there would have been a significant increase this year if the Government had not voluntarily chosen in the Budget to halve the stamp duty on stock exchange transactions and to abolish the investment income surcharge; £520 million was handed out exclusively to those with stocks and shares in excess of £100,000 per person. The Government now have the audacity to come to say that there are insufficient resources for the homeless and the unemployed.

Mr. Gale rose——

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman has made his speech. Other hon. Members wish to speak and I do not wish to speak for very much longer.

What is clearly needed is a revival of local authority house building within which a duty can then be placed on local authorities to provide permanent accommodation of a satisfactory standard for anyone who becomes homeless. That must be the right answer to the problem.

Secondly, if the DHSS can introduce a registration scheme for residential homes—which I support—why not do the same for houses in multiple occupation? That is much needed. At present, owners of multiple-occupied houses have no duty in law to observe decent standards and to ensure the health, safety and welfare of their tenants and residents. Surely at the very least mandatory minimum standards are required to protect residents against fire and overcrowding and to maintain basic amenities, repairs and management in all multi-occupied hostels, lodging houses and bedsit flats.

Thirdly, it is imperative that adequate furniture grants should be readily available to enable people on benefit to move from temporary accommodation into permanent housing. It is outrageous that supplementary benefit restrictions on furniture grants, especially the notorious suitable alternative furnished accommodation rule, should block claimants in bed-and-breakfast accommodation from obtaining cheaper permanent accommodation when it is readily available to them. If the debate achieves nothing else, the Minister should at least announce the lifting of that iniquitous rule which traps people in board and lodging.

Above all, the Government must accept that simply reducing claimants' benefits—the line adopted by the Government throughout the debate — and holding ceilings down on overall expenditure is not the answer to the problem. The Government must acknowledge that control of bed and breakfast by keeping ceilings down has been tried before. They tried it before November 1983 and they had to abandon it last year because claimants were unable to secure accommodation at all or they had to pay charges out of their own money. That is already happening in London where DHSS ceilings are already well below market prices in many cases.

The debate concerns an intensely human issue where the cause of human misery is clearly identifiable and preventable. Yet the Government have chosen to target the victims and not the cause. In effect, homeless claimants are being made to pay the price for the Government's failure to tackle the root of the problem in the rundown of local authority house building which forces thousands upon thousands of homeless persons against their will into squalid and often dangerous bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

The effect of that disregard of the real cause of this terrible human tragedy and the consequential financial punishment which is now being levied on the victims is not only economically misplaced and unwise but surely, by any standards, callous and cruel.

We have learned from bitter experience of the Government that appeals to a spirit of Christmas compassion will undoubtedly fall on stony ground, but we deeply hope that this time public indignation at the gratuitous intensification of the misery of those now made homeless through no fault of their own will cause the Government at least seriously to reconsider the harsh morality of the measures.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): All hon. Members present today are grateful to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) for giving us the opportunity to have this debate. It has been characterised by some thoughtful and well-researched contributions, not least from my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), and the particularly thoughtful contribution from the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Therefore, it is rather sad that the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) should have descended into the extravagant rhetoric of party trench warfare.

We face a serious problem which worries hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is particularly serious because so many young people are being enticed from the north of England, Scotland and other places to our major cities and, increasingly, to seaside resorts. There is ample evidence of that enticement. Unscrupulous hoteliers and boarding house operators in my constituency have put advertisements in Liverpool newspapers inviting people to come to Bournemouth and occupy accommodation that will be paid for by the DHSS. That enticement of young people from their homes and families is taking place on a massive scale.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West was wrong to say that recent developments are associated with increased unemployment. Last year's figures show that while unemployment among those under 25 increased by 9 per cent., the number of claimants for board and lodging in that group increased by 60 per cent. That shows the scale of the problem.

In my constituency, the number of claimants for board-and-lodging payments has increased by 40 per cent.—from 5,000 to 7,000—in the past two years. The estimated number from the Merseyside area has increased from just over 1,000 to 2,500.

There has been an explosion of bed-and-breakfast accommodation in seaside resorts, partly because of the large increase in permitted payments. The Government recognised the problem in the autumn of last year, when they attempted to put limits on the amount that could be paid in any one area and suggested the implementation of local maximum payments. The problem is that the local maximum has become the basic rate in many areas and unscrupulous operators promptly increased their charges when the maximum was set.

My local hotel and guest house associations confirmed to me that that happened and that the rate paid for DHSS accommodation is higher than the rate charged for bed-and-breakfast accommodation that is readily available elsewhere in the town. The net national average payment increased from £47.50 a week in 1982 to £66 a week in 1983. Payments range from £40 to £110 per week.

One hotel in a prime location on the west cliff at Bournemouth now houses only DHSS claimants. We are talking, not of back-street accommodation, but of prime hotel accommodation in prime locations.

The attraction of young people to London and to seaside resorts in the south, which my local newspaper now calls the Costa del Dole, has produced enormous strains on the resources of local authorities, which have to inspect the accommodation, and of fire oficers, who have to ensure that the accommodation complies with fire regulations. The explosion in the number of young people coming into areas in the south of England is causing the difficulties that have arisen with regard to fire regulations and local authority inspections.

More importantly, we are in danger of treating a whole new subculture, because young people who remain unemployed for a long time and who live in such accommodation may turn to wholly undesirable activities. In my constituency there is growing evidence of an increase in drug abuse and drug trafficking, particularly involving hard drugs such as heroin and cocain and, of course, that has implications for muggings, burglaries and prostitution. That is why I am particularly grateful that the Government have taken some action to reduce the number of 16 and 17-year-olds able to qualify for such accommodation, as I believe that those people are particularly vulnerable, especially given the moral decay that seems to accompany such large numbers of young people occupying bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

We have a national scandal on our hands, which the Government's proposals go some way towards correcting. Nevertheless, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North that the proposed levels of payment are often still far too high. In my constituency the present level is £60 a week, but there is ample evidence that that amount is over-generous and well above the amount necessary to provide a reasonable profit and return for genuine guest house proprietors.

I welcome the fact that the Government are proceeding further with a period of consultation, and I hope that it will result in the worst abuses being checked. The Government will then earn the gratitude of the people of Bournemouth, and of taxpayers and parents throughout the United Kingdom, who are deeply concerned about what is happening to so many of our young people.

1.2 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I join others in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on his success in the ballot and on his choice of motion. It is all too seldom that we have an opportunity to discuss the terrible plight of homeless people in this country, yet they are the most vulnerable and deprived people of all. As we approach Christmas, it is particularly appropriate to consider the desperate circumstances in which many people are forced to live.

The debate has so far been marked by a number of powerful and moving speeches, but for the record I should point out that, unfortunately, no representative of the Liberal party has been present for it. Nevertheless, the debate has been characterised by completely different approaches on the part of Conservative and Labour Members. For example, the basic argument of Conservative Members is that an abuse has been identified which the Government are apparently tackling. The honesty and sincerity of Conservative Members in identifying abuses would be more readily commendable to us if the Government and their supporters were less selective in the way in which they identified them.

If the Government were more concerned about the £4,000 million a year that is lost to the Exchequer through tax evasion, and slightly less concerned about other abuses, we might take what they say more seriously. When they identify abuses which affect small numbers of people at the raw end of our supposedly prosperous society, and then go over the top in condemning those abuses while ignoring others, that gives us the right to challenge the Government's thinking. We also have the right to challenge the Government's proposed solutions to those abuses. Their proposals on the board-and-lodging allowance tackle the symptom rather than the root causes.

I wish to tackle the issue raised by a number of my hon. Friends, which has not yet been answered by the Government, about single payments for furniture. It is surely nonsense for the Government to insist, through the DHSS, that claimants for single payments for furniture wishing to move into independent unfurnished rented accommodation must go through an obstacle course which appears deliberately to be designed to prevent them from succeeding. That is surely nonsense when the Government are condemning young people and others for their adoption of the board-and-lodging alternative, into which they have been forced by the Government's policy on single payments.

I took up the matter with a local DHSS office at Archway tower in Junction road. I asked about its policy towards applicants for single payments for furniture. I was rightly referred to the decision of the tribunal of commissioners, which stated clearly:

"the onus of proof on the question whether there is suitable alternative accommodation in the area available to him, lies on the claimant."

That is bad, because imposing the search for alternative accommodation on a claimant might lead to his not moving into proper, decent, unfurnished rented accommodation. I hope that the Government will say today that they will soon change the rules.

The interpretation of the rules is even worse. When the claimant goes to Archway tower to apply for single payments, he is told that he must show:

"1. No suitable furnished accommodation is available in the area or,

2. furnished accommodation is available but it is not available to you or,

3. furnished accommodation is available but it is not suitable to you and the members of your household."

To prove one, two or all three of those criteria, the claimant is presented with a list of five items of information which he must provide before even being considered for single payments. The list includes:

"1. the sources of information used by you to find addresses of suitable furnished accommodation . . .

2. A list of up to 15 addresses for rent which you have visited or contacted.

3. Addresses of accommodation to rent available to you.

4. Addresses of accommodation to rent, available to you but not suitable, and the reasons why they are not suitable.

5. Addresses of accommodation to rent but not available to you, and the reasons why they are not available to you."

That requisition for information is presented to the applicant who goes to the DHSS saying that he wishes to move into rented accommodation, but does not have a bed or a cooker, and asks for a single payment to enable him to buy those items of essential equipment and furniture. If that is not a deterrent for those wanting to go into rented, unfurnished accommodation, I do not know what is.

The net effect of such a process — that obstacle course—imposed on claimants is inevitably that people are forced back into the board and lodging and hotel situation which they are often desperate to get out of. Such a requirement imposes on them the need to go into that inadequate and often squalid accommodation which the Government rightly say is inadequate. I hope that the Government will not hide behind the answers that they have given so far to myself and my hon. Friends when we have pressed the point and argued about it.

The Government have said that the matter is under review and that they will report in due course once they have considered all the information. Surely they have had long enough to see what is happening on the single payments for furniture issue, and surely it is now time for them to come to the House—I hope that the Under-Secretary will say something about this later—and tell us that they have decided to get rid of this wretched tribunal decision and wretched rule, which imposes such an obstacle course on claimants. That is the first and, in many ways, most important commitment that the Government might be able to give us.

Another issue was referred to ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington — the conditions of bed-and-breakfast and hotel accommodation into which not just single people but families with children are forced by local authorities around the country. In passing, I should like to pay tribute to the efforts of my own local authority, the London borough of Islington. It is much maligned by many people, but it has an exceptionally good record in its treatment of homeless families. At the moment it has no families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and, what is more, hotels that lie within its boundaries are the subject of rigorous investigation by both the planning department and the environmental health department to ensure that at least some minimal standards are met. That is not true in many other local authorities around the country.

The conditions in which many families are forced to live are, quite frankly, intolerable. The details have been given by others of my hon. Friends, so I shall not rehearse the well-known details of the squalor that many children, parents and single people suffer when they are put into those horrible and distressing places to live, often for a long time. It is no accident that the families in Camden have revolted so strongly in the past month over the conditions in which they are being forced to live. It is not good enough for the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) to say, "Of course there are these problems, and I am sure that the people responsible will be punished." The problem is that the people responsible will not be punished under current legislation.

I recently asked a written question about bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I asked the Secretary of State "whether he intends to propose legislation which will ensure that conditions in these hotels are satisfactory and safe."

The answer concluded:

"Authorities have ample powers to ensure satisfactory conditions, amenities and safety in houses in multiple occupation. The need for further measures will be considered in the light of the outcome of the Department's current research into the use and condition of such accommodation. — [Official Report, 11 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 441.]

When will that research be concluded, and when will the Government make proposals? We have waited too long already.

The Minister did not answer my question. The reply was about existing legislation, which enables some local authorities, at their discretion, to take action to try to make the hotels a bit safer. The record of local authorities of all political persuasions is not good. For example, it took Tower Hamlets five long years to get round to tackling the conditions in Princes lodge. The notoriety of the treatment of the inhabitants there was exposed in the Daily Mirror six or seven months ago.

After the fire at Clanricarde gardens, the ombudsman found the Kensington and Chelsea authority guilty of maladministration because it had failed to follow up complaints over a number of years. The list of instances is long.

There is no duty on local authorities to enforce proper minimum standards of safety and condition for houses in multiple occupation. Local authorities should be under a duty; they should not be left with a mere discretion. The owners of such houses should also be under a duty in law to observe decent standards and to ensure the welfare, safety and health of tenants. Neither duty exists in law. It is about time that the Government stopped delaying and came forward with proposals for legislation to impose those simple duties.

The relegation to board and lodging or inadequate hotel accommodation of young people, the elderly and families with children is overshadowed by the need for a proper and decent programme launched by the Government to provide houses to rent through local authorities and housing associations. The Minister told us that enormous sums were going into house building. That sounds wonderful, but the reality is different. Housing investment programmes and allocations to local authorities have been more than halved in the last four years. Each year, about 1,500 or 1,600 homeless families in my constituency apply for assistance. About 8,000 people are on the waiting list and about 7,500 on the transfer list. In those circumstances, the cut in the provision of funds for housing to rent is scandalous.

I welcome the provisions which the Minister for Housing and Construction announced earlier today, but they are marginal. I welcome the reinstatement of the freedom to use Housing Corporation short-life money for dwellings owned by the local authority. However, I must point out that that power was removed by the Government two years ago. Now they are trumpeting the fact that they have brought it back. That is wonderful—I welcome it —but it is not enough and it is too late.

The change in the homelessness indicators in the general needs index for the HIP allocations is also welcome, but it is on the margin and will not in any way meet the enormous need that exists and the desperate need to increase the amount of investment devoted to the provision of decent quality accommodation to rent from local authorities.

The Government have reneged on their obligations to homeless people. In bringing forward their latest measures they have identified the wrong problem and adopted the wrong solution. I hope that when the Government consider the desperate needs and plight of so many people around the country who have no job and no home and simply want to create a decent minimal standard of life for themselves, they will listen with more attention to their conscience. The Government are not helping those people. I hope that as a result of today's debate they will think more seriously about the needs of those people and give them more attention than hitherto.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I, too, welcome this important debate, which has made it plain that there is concern and caring on both sides of the House about a problem which is not just financial — perhaps not primarily financial—but arises from a combination of financial and deeply human factors.

My interest in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and hotels began with a letter from a constituent in July 1983. My constituent wrote to me from a hotel in Croydon. He told me that he had been a Croydon resident but had gone north with his wife to obtain employment. In the north he had been made redundant twice. His health had suffered and a doctor advised him and his family to return to Croydon and they had done so. My constituent wrote:

"My wife and I and our two daughters aged 9 and 5 now live in a room 12 ft by 10 ft. We eat in here, we live in here and sleep in here. The rent is £102 a week, which the DHSS pay. I receive £152 a week in total. I have been offered jobs at £80 and £90 a week but I cannot afford to take them because my benefit will go and I will not be able to stay here any longer. I am currently ill with worry and my wife and I fear a breakdown."

That is a typical example of the letters that many hon. Members have received in the past few years. I went to see the family and found that the conditions were just as my constituent had described them. I saw the two children. They were already looking almost numb with the shock of the life that they were leading. Two children aged 9 and 5 were existing in that small room. I thought that it would be small wonder if, when they reached the age of 14 or 15, they became delinquent or problem children. If those children turned to crime, who could say in all conscience that the answer lay in detention centres, corporal punishment and more discipline?

I thought that I saw 10 rooms there. They were let at an average of £100 a week. That meant an income for the landlord of about £40,000 or £50,000 a year. That seemed a little greedy — a somewhat high return on his investment. I also saw that the taxpayer was not being given value for money, but the taxpayer is not the only customer. The real customers are the husband and wife and their children. There are two customers in any service. I also saw the overcrowding. I wondered what on earth there was to stop the landlord telling the husband and wife, "Have a room for yourselves and put your children in another one." Where was the compassion in that hotel, or was the only motive money?

I followed the matter up by asking the Minister who was then responsible for these matters whether it was the DHSS's responsibility to check the quality of accommodation before making payments, with special reference to overcrowding. His response was that responsibility lay with the local housing authority, not with the DHSS. I immediately thought that something was wrong, because much money is being paid by the taxpayer, but the taxpayer, through the DHSS, is not checking the value of the accommodation.

I then got in touch with the local housing authority and discovered, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) so eloquently argued, that there is no legal obligation on the local authority to check accommodation. It has only powers to do so. I read a letter which set out those powers and found it complicated. It seemed full of red tape. I also discovered that local authorities are often too busy, for whatever reason, to follow the issue through and to oblige owners of such accommodation to comply with decent standards. They do not follow through their powers as they might. Ought there not to be duties rather than powers?

I fear that the problem is so enormous that we cannot get a straightforward answer. We have too much to do to achieve better results for taxpayers and customers. However, it is ridiculous that the man in the hotel could not afford to take jobs paying £80 or £90 a week because his supplementary benefit of £152 a week would disappear. That is sad, because there is dignity in a job. We should get to grips with our benefits system and enable people who are offered work to take it. They should not be penalised by loss of benefit to the extent that working becomes not worth while. I would much rather that the man were in work for £80 or £90 a week and had his income topped up by supplementary benefit. He would then have the dignity of work.

There should be an obligation on some body, whether the DHSS or the local authority, to inspect accommodation and tell a landlord, "This will not do. You must do better. You must provide two rooms for a husband and wife with two or three children. You cannot crowd them in like this. We will not have such housing in our area."

In general, however, I welcome the Government's proposals to prevent abuse of supplementary benefits paid to people in board-and-lodging accommodation. Perhaps the Government are approaching the problem from only one end. Although we must examine the financial abuses, we should approach the matter from the other end and ensure that the customers — those who live in such accommodation—get value for money.

I welcome the Government's proposed survey of bed-and-breakfast accommodation. If they examine the matter from the point of view of the interest of the recipients—those in housing difficulties—that will be good.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for the fact that I may not be present to hear his reply, but I shall read it with great interest. I know from my short time in the House that many hon. Members from all parties are caring and compassionate, and have knowledge of the problems at the sharp end. It is vital that we recognise our responsibility both for the public purse and for each other's welfare. We should help solve each other's day-to-day problems. We must remove the blot on the landscape. No hon. Member can be proud of the appalling conditions that exist in this area. We would do well, if we are to pass on to our children and grandchildren a civilised country, to concentrate on some of the saddest aspects of homelessness.

1.30 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I apologise for my absence at the beginning of the debate. Together with virtually every London Member of Parliament, I had a meeting with the Commissioner of Police about the reorganisation proposals that are to be introduced in the London area. There would have been more London Members present had we not discovered that the chief of police had decided to consult Marks and Spencer and MacDonald's Hamburgers on reorganisation rather than hon. Members. I am sure that hon. Members will deplore that.

It is clear that tax cuts on the cost of reducing support for the homeless are a leg-up for the better off, a spit in the eye to concerned public opinion and a kick in the groin for those who are already down and out. The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) gave the impression—it reflects the false popular image—that accommodation for the homeless is a case of young scroungers taking holidays in seaside resorts. But people are in bed-and-breakfast hostels because they have nowhere else to go, and many of them are not young people.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) argued, the number of people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has increased because homelessness has increased. The Government claim that many more people under the age of 25 now claim board-and-lodging allowances. That reflects three main factors. First, benefit rates for people who stay with their parents have been cut, which has led to more pressure to leave home. Secondly, the long-term effects of youth unemployment are beginning to show, with more people getting on their bikes to look for work. Thirdly, no other housing options remain open.

The tragic position of the homeless reflects the abolition of the strategic housing role of the GLC. I witness that in my own constituency. When I became the Member of Parliament for Vauxhall in 1979, we used to move 3,500 families or individuals from the borough to alternative accommodation in London. That has now trickled almost to a standstill. My constituents recognise the inter-borough nomination scheme to be a farce. The abolition of the GLC's housing role has slammed the door on the inner city and doubled the waiting list. There are 20,000 people in Lambeth waiting for housing transfers. People come every week to my advice surgeries to protest about the conditions in which they live and about the fact that they are in hostel accommodation. They need, as the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) rightly said, better value for public money. But the best value for public money would be council house accommodation or other housing.

The Government's proposed limits are hopelessly unrealistic. The rate for London will be £60 or £70 a week for full board and lodging. The current DHSS level in four central London offices is £89 a week, and for Tresco house

[Mr. Stuart Holland]

£110 a week. How is that gap to be met? The effects will be little short of catastrophic for the least privileged and most socially handicapped in our society. Many voluntary hostels will be forced to close as they will have no source of funding to replace lost rent. Many people will be thrown out because they cannot pay. Landlords will have a financial incentive to pack in more people per room and to spend less on maintenance. More tragedies such as that which occurred in Camden will happen.

Hostels which are aid or refuge projects, such as the Clapham women's aid project in my constituency, will have problems. The Government have changed the basis of payment to the refuge. It will no longer be made direct to the refuge from the DHSS, but will go to the women who use it, many of whom are in desperate financial circumstances. The result is that the refuge cannot rely upon a steady rental income. It is therefore faced with a possibility of closure. I am sure that the Minister will wish to address himself to that aspect of the problem and return the payment system to the status quo. Without it, several of the women who are gaining considerable support from the project will be rendered technically homeless and some of them will be put out on the street.

I was impressed by the speech of the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West. He was right to challenge the amount of money spent in bed-and-breakfast hostels and to stress that we must consider not just the cost to the taxpayer but the value for money obtained by the user. But he did not follow through the implication of his analysis, which is that when high rents are being charged by unscrupulous landlords there should be at least a rent ceiling if not rent control.

The Government, who so often stress that they want value for money in the private sector, as the spending agency have every right to determine standards of accommodation to avoid overcrowding and a system of rent ceilings and control. There is a double standard at present. There has been a consensus on housing since the Parker Morris standards were introduced after the war. Rooms built in the public sector had to be of a minimum size. But we do not demand the same in the case of accommodation for the homeless. The Government are therefore inconsistent.

The cuts in social expenditure directly reflect the general cuts which are endemic to the Government's economic strategy. That strategy is designed to maintain the shibboleth of monetary targets, but it completely fails to recognise that public spending, such as the social security spending on the homeless, directly sustains rather than drains the private sector.

I should like to take up the points made by the hon. Member for Thanet, North with which I strongly disagree. He gave an example of a hostel which had a £30,000 cash turnover from single homeless people, which was paid by the DHSS. Let us analyse what that revenue is spent on. It is public money going to the private sector. Who does the repairs? It is almost always the local builder. One of the major companies—ICI or Berger—will provide the materials for the decorations; Allied Carpets will probably supply the carpets; and the furniture may well be supplied by GEC's Schreiber division. There are no public enterprises supplying such goods and services or things like blankets and sheets.

DHSS payments for accommodation for homeless people are a direct transfer of money from the public to the private sector. There is only one exception. It is the public-to-public transfer of money for gas or electricity. That includes heating. Do the Government wish to condemn those people who might otherwise be on the street to hypothermia?

The Prime Minister has cited St. Francis of Assisi, but this is not the morality of that saint. Rather, it is the morality, denounced by St. Matthew, of to those "that hath shall be given . . . but from him that hath not shall be taken away".

It is a poisoned Christmas present which neither the homeless nor the caring public will forget.

1.40 pm

Mr. Nell Thorne (Ilford, South): I have listened with great interest to the debate and I compliment the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on introducing this subject, which needs airing frequently. Today, from both sides of the House, we have heard some unsavoury stories of what is going on in such accommodation. Undoubtedly, there is a lot of profiteering and racketeering at the expense of the taxpayer. The Government have decided, partly because of the publicity given to recent cases, to take some action in this regard, and it is right that they should do so. We have also heard about fire hazards, assaults on tenants, the problems of getting proper service, of general harassment and even about the bully-boy tactics of some grasping owners who go down to the post office to assist in a strong-arm way the people who are claiming their benefit to collect their money. We all deplore this.

For too long, we have relied on the present system to solve the problem. We have to look much deeper below the surface than we have looked this morning. No hon. Member could do other than deplore the conditions under which so many of these people are living, but we need look a little deeper and ask ourselves how this has come about. We have heard something this morning about lack of Government investment in this sector. We have been told that if only the Government would spend more money in this way things would be better. The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) pointed out the advantages to British industry of supplying equipment for proper fire-proofing and for kitchens in making accommodation much more suitable. I accept what he says and I support him and other hon. Members in their demand that there should be an effective inspectorate to ensure that where the taxpayers' money is being spent it is being spent properly. Those who provide accommodation for those who are not able to look after their own interests adequately, for the reasons explained by a number of hon. Members, should at least be required to reach a certain standard before such accommodation is considered suitable for taxpayers' money.

However, I wish to draw the attention of the House to one fundamental aspect of this matter—the role of the private sector. We have had controls over the housing sector since the first world war, when rent controls were first brought in. Since that time it has been a requirement that certain unfurnished dwellings — and now even furnished dwellings that are let and are not part of a hotel or hostel complex which include the provision of service —are subject to control. The control is such that it deters the majority of people who would be able and willing to make an investment in that sector.

To whom do I look to do it? I have no wish to look at the kind of racketeers who are operating in the market at present. But there are substantial sums available. We have heard recently about the millions of pounds removed overseas by the National Union of Mineworkers. There are substantial sums available in the trade union movement generally. Millions of pounds are invested by the life assurance offices every week. The pension funds have similar sums which they have to place to make an investment return for those who benefit from the income.

Where is all this money going? It is going to the stock market and to the money market, but not to the housing market where I believe it should be going. If we had tackled the problem sooner—certainly by the beginning of the 1950s — housing today would not be in the appalling state it is. There would be a lot more choice for people looking for accommodation. There would be a lot more competition. Who, after all, would go to a shop to buy a second-rate pullover? Instead, we go to Marks and Spencer and other similar stores where we find extremely good value for money. That good value for money has been created by the sensible investment of capital in machinery, enterprises and shops.

There is no earthly reason why the same should not have been done in housing, why there should not have been a choice, and why ill-equipped and poor housing should not have been phased out many years ago. Sadly, that has not happened because successive Governments have tried to interfere in the market, and we all know what happens when Governments interfere in any area—and certainly it applies to housing.

We are discussing the appalling conditions being experienced at the margin. It is people who are not able to look after themselves who are so badly affected. If we had made a proper market, these people at the margin would have been provided for in adequate accommodation and it would not have been necessary to look for other remedies.

In the general housing sector we have the fair rent officers, who were a creation of a previous Labour Government to reintroduce a system to ensure control. That control is fine for those who have adequate places in which to live, and there is no difficulty for them. They can quite easily go on living in the accommodation that they occupy. They have certain rights given to them by Parliament to remain in that accommodation, and Parliament also gives them protection. But it does not provide for those who come along subsequently looking for accommodation and are not provided for, and there is no way in which property owners will provide accommodation if the return that they can get on it is limited and they are prevented from maintaining it as they should.

If we accept that it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that everyone is adequately housed, it should also be their responsibility to ensure that a proper return is obtained for those who provide sensible and adequate accommodation. That we have not done. As a first step there should be a requirement that fair rent officers must take into account the cost of the construction of the buildings that they are considering so that the owner, whoever it may be—whether a trade union or a private individual — receives an adequate return upon his investment. He should be able to invest a sum of money that has a certain purchasing power. He ought to be able to realise that sum of money in the future and find that it has a similar purchasing power. That is not possible in the housing market now.

We acknowledge that in the majority of cases it is the taxpayer who makes up the difference. Therefore, it would not be the tenants, who cannot afford to pay, who would be meeting the extra cost; the extra cost would be met by the taxpayer. In freeing the market we should enable a person who is receiving benefit to have a much wider choice. He would not be inhibited, as he is now, by being restricted to that section of the market that ensures that he lives in sub-standard accommodation.

The only answer that has been offered this morning is that we should introduce yet further controls, rules and regulations. That will cost the taxpayer a great deal more money in supervision. Therefore, would it not be more sensible to look at this problem sensibly, in a proper and open way, and try to move as soon as possible towards a decontrolled market, thereby increasing the quality of life for everybody, including those harassed and inadequately accommodated people whom we have been discussing this morning?

1.52 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The motion on the Order Paper today is a bit of a catch all. It covers a very wide range of topics. However, we recognise that the motion has been put down for the worthiest of motives. I congratulate the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on the dignity and responsibility with which he introduced this most important topic. The House may not be so full on a Friday as it might be, but, as is often the case on a Friday, the debate has been informed and interesting for those who have taken part in it. No doubt that has been noticed by the considerable number of members of the public who have been listening to the debate.

The debate concerns the housing of people in need. My concern is the housing of people who are in housing need. Therefore, I reject the case that has been made for many young, homeless people. They are not in housing need. A very large number of them are not homeless. They have homes to which to go. Indeed, they have homes which they have recently left. My experience in Birmingham and London and the experience of hon. Members on both sides of the House who have constituencies in seaside resorts is that many of those young people would be much better served by a caring and responsible housing department or social services department giving them a train ticket, walking them to the nearest station and putting them on the train back home. If they are unemployed and miserable in Glasgow, we can be absolutely certain that if they are unemployed they will be a great deal more miserable in London. It is not right and proper that, where they are unemployed, they should be perhaps enjoying themselves prancing around on the beaches, as we have seen recently on television programmes, in the constituencies of a number of hon. Members.

There are young homeless people. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, who was an assistant director of social services, will be aware that one of the most acute problems is that which faces young people who have grown up in the care of local authorities. I was responsible for 4,000 young people who were in that position. We carried out a survey and found that it was misnamed a children's department. Three quarters of those we were looking after were over the age of 11, and half of them were over the age of 14. Consequently we were preparing those young people to live in institutions of one kind or another—frequently, sadly, penal institutions—for the rest of their lives. Therefore we have been cruel by being kind to many of those young people. It would be better if we said to them, "Go home, and start to learn how to get on with your parents, your brothers and sisters and everybody else."

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) referred to elderly and handicapped people who are living in private and voluntary homes. That is not just a problem in the major resorts of the south coast; it is becoming a major problem in many parts of the country. Many of those homes—in my view, most of them—are first-class and provide an excellent standard of care, not just for the elderly but for the mentally ill, mentally handicapped, disabled, disabled children, and so on.

Some of the growth in accommodation provided no doubt shows the considerable growth in need during recent years, particularly as hospitals for the long-term care of disabled people have tended to reduce their numbers. But some of the growth also shows the greed of those who are prepared to provide the accommodation. In 1978, 7,000 such people claimed supplementary benefit as residents in private and voluntary homes—about 20 per cent. of the total number of beds provided in such accommodation. By 1982, that had risen to 15,700—30 per cent. of all beds. It is estimated that by 1984, 42,500 people will be living in such specialist—or purporting to be specialist—accommodation and claiming supplementary benefit. That must be nearly half of all the beds so provided. The cost has risen from £6 million in 1978 to an estimated £190 million this year. That is a staggering growth.

There used to be no controls whatever on DHSS payments to people in such accommodation, controls were then introduced and they were entirely locally determined. That posed considerable problems for DHSS officers in the regions. If there were only one such home in the region, or of that type in that neighbourhood, that proprietor could jolly well claim what he or she liked and that became the norm for the neighbourhood. The result has been a rapid increase in expenditure. That contrasts with restrictions on local authority expenditure, and, in some parts of the country — not the area I represent — considerable restrictions and, indeed, cuts on NHS expenditure which have prevented the easy movement of people out of hospitals and long-term care. The Government now plan some changes and they are very much to be welcomed.

I want to add to what my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North said in drawing attention to the problems that some of those changes will present. We are talking not just about the amount of money that goes to pay for all those people, but about standards of care. The Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983—a hesitant attempt to enforce standards of care, particularly in nursing homes — does not touch the majority of the 40,000-odd people that I have just mentioned.

There was a persistent problem in Birmingham in enforcing any standards whatever in terms of care. The environmental health departments had ample powers to enforce standards in terms of the number of kitchen tiles that should be used, the number of toilets and the quality of the lino, but nobody has any powers over any institution that calls itself a hotel to enforce some standards of care.

I strongly believe that a percentage of the money that the DHSS will pay for that accommodation should be handed over, perhaps in some registration form, to the local authority in order to pay for an inspectorate. When the Select Committee on Social Services visited Norfolk recently—that county has had an enormous growth in private care, much of it excellent—we were told that the local authority had one officer to go round the various establishments to advise them on the kind of people that they were sometimes unwittingly taking on—sometimes mentally disabled people with serious problems. That local authority was doing its best to help the individual and the proprietors of the various establishments.

Some standards of care should be set. That would not be too difficult, because in many cases, as has already been pointed out, the establishments are claiming an attendance allowance, so somebody is looking at the residents and making a judgment about what standards of care they require. I feel strongly that, as we have little control at the moment on how much we spend on that, and no control on what the money goes on, the divorce between cash and care has become complete. That is wrong and a terrible way to treat those poor people.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction is right to say that we have loads of legislation on multiple occupation. Do we need more? There is legislation going back to the Sanitary Act 1866, when the term "houses in multiple occupation" was introduced. We have 120 years of legislation on conditions in houses in multiple occupation.

Management orders can be served when it appears to a local authority that there are unsatisfactory conditions in an HMO. Such orders can cover the water supply, drainage, kitchens, bathrooms, water closets in common use, sinks, wash basins, staircases, corridors, outbuildings, and so on. If the owner does not do what he is told, he can be served with a detailed order telling him what has to be put right, and that can cover natural and artificial light, ventilation, water supply and so on.

Under the Housing Act 1980, and previous legislation, local authorities may require the provision of satisfactory means of escape from fire. Under more recent legislation, it is mandatory on local authorities to require such provision in HMOs of three storeys and more.

There is more than enough legislation. The problem is that most local authorities do not use it.

Mr. Boyes: Does the hon. Lady agree that only 2 or 3 per cent. of HMOs have three storeys or more? We are worried about the vast majority, which have fewer than three storeys.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman may know more about the matter than I do, but I understand that local authorities have powers in respect of all such properties. The mandatory requirement is imposed only in respect of fire escapes in larger properties.

The fact that local authorities have the powers has been amply demonstrated in Sheffield. In the late 1970s, the city council decided to have a crack at its houses in multiple occupation. It did a full survey and read the law to find out what it was entitled to do. It was found that the vast majority of houses in multiple occupation in Sheffield were occupied by young single people, as one would expect in a university city.

Many of those HMOs were substandard: 64 per cent. had an insufficient number of wash hand basins, 47 per cent. did not have enough WCs, 7 per cent. had too few bathrooms—they must be a clean lot up in Sheffield—53 per cent. did not have fire-resistant doors and screens and 42 per cent. did not have fire escapes. A total of 84 per cent. needed essential repairs.

Sheffield was starting from a reasonable base, which is more typical of places outside London than it is of London itself. The council decided to use its powers. It spoke to all the owners and asked the owners of 60 per cent. of the HMOs to comply with occupancy, amenity and safety standards.

As a result, the owners of 22 per cent. of the properties incurred extra costs, the owners of 8 per cent. lost income, mainly through a reduction in occupancy, and the owners of 26 per cent. both lost rent and incurred costs. One might expect landlords to pull out promptly in those circumstances, but that did not happen. About 70 per cent. said that they would relet any vacant property, and when a check was done a year later — what a competent authority to find out what had happened—it was found that 76 per cent. of HMOs were relet, mainly to the same sort of people.

The magazine Housing Review, of November-December 1983, said:

"The Sheffield experience suggests that where a council uses its discretionary powers there are good chances of HMOs being up to standard, that in using its powers it runs no apparent risk of creating a greater withdrawal of lettings than would otherwise occur . . . A significant minority are, however, still substandard, partly because, in the context of other priorities, the Council has not been conscientiously searching them out, getting them registered and improved."

Cases of bad practice are rife when the council does not bother. There was a tragic case in Manchester when four men died in a lodging house called the Hyde House hotel in the Ardwick green area on 16 December last year. There was a fire and a substantial investigation, which resulted in reports at the inquest as to why the fire occurred and why those involved could not get out. The hotel did not have a fire certificate. The door leading to the fire escape on the top floor was nailed up at the time of the fire, the fire alarm system did not work and there were no extinguishers. At the inquest a fire prevention officer said that he was not sure whether there were any extinguishers, and was criticised by the coroner for his vagueness. In other words, someone had been to the house and had had a look round, but had done nothing about it.

There were continuous reports from voluntary organisations about that property, even in the couple of weeks leading up to the fire. One problem noted at the time was that residents could not complain, because the owner made them sign over their Giros and then gave them their change after the rent had been deducted. Ten years ago we came across that problem in Birmingham. It is not that difficult for a social services department to appoint a social worker as trustee—which is what we did—and then to ensure that any money, particularly from mentally handicapped people, is handed over through the social services department, and put into their post office books. A responsible local authority would have done that. But Manchester has set up a working party.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, who sadly is not present, will find that any efforts to set up an inquiry are in danger of the same thing. There is a habit of saying, "Let's take another look at the problem." But we know what the problem is, as it is only too apparent. Consequently, we should ensure that local authorities use their ample powers. Indeed, my right hon. and hon. Friends would be well advised to kick them along a bit.

Bed-and-breakfast hotels are an absolute scandal. Placing tenants in them is really done only in London, where there are one or two honourable exceptions, of which Islington is the most noticeable. The amounts expended on putting poor souls into diabolical accommodation are staggering. There are now more than 500 homeless families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in Brent alone, at a cost to the taxpayer in 1982-83 of almost £3 million. By 1986, it is estimated that Brent will be forking out £6 million per year to London hoteliers, which is enough to repair more than 21,000 council properties annually and to finance a house building loan of £100 million, which would provide permanent housing for every Brent family now in bed-and-breakfast accommodation from now onwards.

The amounts of money are staggering. Last year, London's 32 councils managed to spend more than £7 million on keeping the homeless in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. In particular authorities the problem is acute. For example, in Hackney the number jumped from 92 homeless families in 1981 to 209 only two years later. Yet Hackney has more than 400 empty properties, over 200 of which have been empty for more than a year. So it would serve Hackney and its tenants very well if the money were spent on repairing properties and sorting out some form of permanent accommodation.

I recommend to my right hon. and hon. Friends that housing investment programme returns should require details of families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation; otherwise it is difficult to find out the facts. It is worth pointing out that in the sort of properties under discussion, GLC fire certificates are mandatory, although many of the properties have not been inspected for years. If we are thinking of how to find some money, I suggest that the GLC could first use the £10 million with which it has been promoting its own future, and then use the £10 million with which it funds its silly women's committee. That is simply a way of paying a load of lady councillors to talk to each other round a table.

Attention has been drawn to the death of Mrs. Karim and her two children in a fire at 46 Gloucester place. That is the only point at which some hon. Members have got their facts slightly wrong. Their mistake is significant. Mrs. Karim and those who besieged Camden town hall were Camden tenants, but they were being housed not in Camden, but in Westminster. I see that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) confirms that. That is interesting, because it means that not one, but three councils were involved; the council that placed the tenants, the council in whose area the tenants were placed, and the GLC. Thus, it is very easy for there to be a lot of buck passing. For example, the owner of the properties has not been prosecuted, but he should have been. In June this year he owned several adjoining properties. The GLC issued a consent to join Nos. 42, 44 and 46 by breaching the party walls, yet no fire certificate was issued.

[Mrs. Currie]

The families, having made a fuss, have now been allocated accommodation elsewhere in Camden. If they can be allocated that accommodation after someone has died, they could have been allocated it previously. There is absolutely no reason for any family to be put into bed-and-breakfast accommodation when there is empty property in this city, as there is in other cities, and when there is money available. Such people could obtain housing benefit on a permanent tenancy. If Islington can do it—and it has—and if Birmingham can do it—and it has because there is not a single Birmingham council tenant in bed-and-breakfast accommodation — so can Brent, Hackney and other areas.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does the hon. Lady accept that Camden, in giving a recent commitment to house all the homeless families currently housed by London Lets—which, because of the squeeze on its overall housing programme, must renege on its obligations to many families on the waiting and transfer lists—will solve the problem that she rightly identifies?

Mrs. Currie: All councils must decide which families come first. I suggest that Camden should pay a great deal more attention to those families than to the young homeless for whom it appears to have a great deal of affection.

It is not housing management; it is a case of out of sight, out of mind. It is an absolute scandal. I recognise the genuine desire of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington to help people, especially families, in desperate need. It is sad that so little attention is paid by all the authorities to the genuine problems until they begin to cost a great deal of money, in the case of the Government, or until somebody dies, in the case of councils.

We have obligations towards many of those people and we should use the existing law and existing cash to discharge those responsibilities to help people towards a happier and more settled life.

2.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I join the chorus of congratulation from both sides of the House for the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on his good fortune in winning first place in the ballot for private Member's motions and on using it to introduce such an important subject. I also congratulate him on making such a responsible start to what has proved to be a valuable debate.

The debate shows the importance of Fridays when, to some considerable extent, we forget our party political rhetoric and show that we recognise the problems that inevitably exist in our society. I must mention especially the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) and for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). They demonstrated that Conservative Members very much share the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington and his hon. Friends about housing problems.

I hope that I shall not spoil this beneficent beginning by saying that it is a pity that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) saw fit to enter into the realms of party hyperbole, which was not surprising as it was characteristic of him. I am sorry that he is not here now. He, together with other hon. Members, was kind enough to apologise for his absence because, like all of us should do, he is rushing to his constituency. I hope that he will understand that his absence cannot exempt me from responding to what he had to say.

The issues that we are dealing with, particularly the DHSS measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State some weeks ago, must be set against a financial background. I should be the first to recognise that we are not only talking about money, but money must be a part of our consideration because we are concerned about the massive resources that are being used, and we must use them properly and effectively. The serious questions that have arisen are based on the proposition that the sums that we are talking about can be used much more effectively in other areas of the social security programme or of the Government's general public spending programme.

I remind the House that, for example, spending on ordinary board-and-lodging accommodation rose from £166 million a year in December 1982 to £277 million in December 1983. Our best estimates show that the total is now running at about £570 million a year and, unless action is taken, that figure is likely to grow by a further 50 per cent. by December 1985.

Mr. Stuart Holland: That is one seven hundredth part of total national expenditure. Will the Minister answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), myself and others that that public spending goes almost entirely to the private sector and probably less than 10 per cent. goes in electricity or other heating charges?

Mr. Whitney: The essential question is how we use the £40 billion in the social security programme. This is a serious problem. Ironically, it was considered by the hon. Member for Oldham, West as a serious problem on 29 November, when he said that there was an "enormous and reckless abuse of taxpayers' money." — [Official Report, 29 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 1099.]

The hon. Gentleman seems to have changed his mind in the few days that have elapsed since then. I do not know what the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) thought on 29 November.

I am glad to know, however, that this financial problem has been recognised by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Therefore, it would have been irresponsible not to take action to prevent that trend from continuing because otherwise it would have jeopardised other parts of our social security programme.

As a first step, we laid regulations on 22 November which will enable Ministers to take direct control of existing limits governing board-and-lodging payments. Those regulations were debated and approved in Committee on 12 December and will be debated in another place on 17 December. In other words, we are instituting a temporary freeze while the consultative document is considered. We recognise that the consultative process is fast, but it must be fast because of the nature of the problem and the rate of growth in the financial spending with which it seeks to deal.

I hope to deal with some of the points that were made on both sides of the House in the debate. It is right that the debate continued a little longer than usual, but it means that there is little time left for my reply, so if I cannot deal with all the points, many of which were considerably detailed, I shall write to the hon. Members who raised them.

Many hon. Members concentrated on the levels that we have proposed as maxima for board and lodging in various parts of the country. For example, the hon. Member for Vauxhall thought that the maximum of £70 in London was woefully inadequate, whereas many other people take a different view. It seems to me that that is entirely likely to be right. My hon. Friends the Members for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale), for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) suggested that the maximum of £60 that we have proposed in those areas may be on the high side. We welcome those contributions. That is the sort of issue that we shall consider in the consultative process.

One point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North seemed to be based on a certain misunderstanding. My hon. Friend was worried about the new proposed limit. As the consultative document makes clear, where the existing limit for an area, uprated by 5 per cent., still falls below the proposed new limit, that figure will be adopted until November 1986. That will apply in areas such as Newquay where the local present limit is less than £50. I hope that my hon. Friend is assured about that. An important consultative process is involved.

The evidence that young people are being given board and lodging, especially in seaside resorts, is worrying, and a more important factor than some Labour Members admit. The number of boarders under the age of 25 rose by about 60 per cent. between 1982 and 1983. The number rose from 23,000 to 37,000 in that year. That figure should be set against the 9 per cent. increase in the number of claimants in general in that age group. The increase in the number of people moving to seaside areas is marked.

Several of my hon. Friends have cited figures. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West said that the number of people from Merseyside moving to his area had increased from 1,000 to 2,500 in 12 months. That is of concern to us all. The number of 16 and 17-year-olds claiming as boarders at any one time is estimated to have risen from about 4,300 at the end of 1982 to about 10,000 today.

We have heard much from Opposition Members about the family and the pressures upon it. I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South said about that. I agree with her about ending "privileges" for the 16 and 17-year-olds. We should invite them to move back to their families, where they should be. Young people should not be subjected to the pressures of the present system.

The system is often abused. I think of the wealth of advertisements for Thanet hotels and guest houses specifying "High class DHSS accommodation", "DHSS fees arranged" and

"On DHSS? Living in poor conditions? Why not live by the sea at Margate . . . ?"

We must end such pressures. It cannot be for the benefit of the family to allow young people to be beguiled in that way. The regulations allow accommodation for those who are looking for work and we recognise that there are exceptions.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), in an effective contribution, referred to the pressures on young people north and south of the border. Government Members representing southern constituencies know of the pressures. The difference between north and south is not as absolute as the hon. Gentleman suggests. We recognise the pressures on young people. I agree that we should ensure that proper reception arrangements are available for the young people who come to London, but should we not make changes to discourage young people from moving.

Both the hon. Member for Linlithgow and the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) asked what opportunities were on offer to the young people. A number of alternatives are on offer. In particular, there is the youth training scheme, which is under-subscribed throughout the country. I understand that even in the area represented by the hon. Member for Linlithgow more places are available than are taken up. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that, except in special individual circumstances, with which our regulations can certainly deal, it would be much more sensible for a young person from Scotland or anywhere else to stay put and join the youth training scheme than to go to the Costa del Dole, as it has been called, or to face the uncertainties of central London.

We understand the concerns that have been expressed, but we believe that our proposals are flexible enough. There would be exceptional categories. Those categories would include young people with a dependent child or children, or who are pregnant; young people who have been in local authority care and cannot return to a family home, and handicapped young people who need to be in board-and-lodging accommodation. They would also include young people who have been in board-and-lodging accommodation while in employment—but payment as a boarder in such cases will be for a limited period only —and young people for whom accommodation in board and lodging is the only means of preventing serious damage or serious risk to health or safety.

That list shows that we recognise that there are exceptions. I believe, however, that in the generality of cases the best answer is for the young person to stay within a reasonable distance of his home. I am thinking in particular of 16 and 17-year-olds.

References were made to the problems of furnished accommodation by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington and a number of other hon. Members. They referred to the problems connected with the special needs payments. The basis of our policy is a recognition that some people moving into unfurnished accommodation genuinely need such help. Secondly, however, we also recognise that we have a duty to safeguard the taxpayers' money. The purchase of furniture can often involve spending several hundred pounds.

Mr. Stuart Holland: For furniture?

Mr. Whitney: Indeed.

Thirdly, we recognise the need for equity between those on benefit, who can gain durable assets from such payments, and those in work on low incomes who are not helped in that way. We therefore give such help to claimants with a pensioner, child, pregnant woman or chronically sick or disabled person in the family. We also help claimants whose move is necessary in the sense that they have satisfied the conditions for help with removal expenses—for example, because of divorce, bereavement or overcrowding.

Other claimants who have been on benefit for six months or more and have no immediate prospect of a job, and those who have just come out of prison, long-stay hospital or some other institution, can also get help. But in those cases we think it fair, before providing large sums of money to set up home in unfurnished accommodation, to ask whether there is some suitable already furnished accommodation where the claimant could live instead.

I have noted the points which have been made about the "suitable alternative furnished accommodation" rule, but I think it right, for the reasons already outlined, that there should be some restriction of that kind.

Hon. Members have suggested that it would be better value for taxpayers' money to make furniture payments more freely available and so avoid people going into bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I am grateful for their acknowledgement that we are right to try to get better value for money out of board-and-lodging payments. However, I suggest that we are going about it the right way. The answer is not to sweep aside all the restrictions on furniture payments and to pay large sums of money to any claimant who wants to equip a new home, irrespective of his circumstances, job prospects and length of time on benefit. Our rules on furniture payments concentrate help where it is most needed. That is the basis of the policy that we have debated today. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction emphasised what we are doing——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

British Transport Police

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): The British Transport police was established in its original form some 150 years ago. It is a body of about 2,000 men and women to the federation of which I act as parliamentary adviser. The British Transport police has provided a quiet and efficient service and it has seldom been necessary for it to ask for assistance to enable it to carry out its duties. I am raising this issue today because there is now an argument for the Government to give it assistance.

The British Transport police have three areas of responsibility—the London underground, docks owned by Associated British Ports, and British Rail premises and trains. The transport police have recently gained some prominence. In April 1984 they were involved in controlling the section of the football supporting fraternity which became rowdy during travel on cross-channel ferries. The House will recall that the transport police's conduct merited considerable praise from the House and the press. Week in, week out, the British Transport police have a duty to control unruly football fans on trains and at stations. I therefore do not need to emphasise their solid reputation for effective policing to standards equivalent to those found in the civil police.

In 1980, there was a joint conference on violence in public transport which was attended by the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Transport of the day. A major role in the maintenance of good order on public transport was allocated to the British Transport police. As a result of the conference, an additional £1 million was made available to create special mobile units. As those units have unfolded into the London underground there is little doubt that underground staff and the public have felt considerable benefits. The system has worked well and there is a feeling of greater security. However, that is quite different from saying that to travel on the last train has become an agreeable experience and it is certainly not to say that to be a driver or a guard on a London underground train is not to be left open to considerable risk.

There is now worry about a possible reduction in the number of officers in the force. We are comforted by the implication that the reduction will be achieved by natural wastage. There has been no recruiting since May. But why should there be a reduction in the force? It seems to stem from the reduced Government grant to the British Railways Board. British Rail has been asked to review all its expenditure. It has concluded that a reduction in policing must be part of any package which it presents to achieve that reduction in expenditure.

I do not believe that British Rail wishes to see the strength of the British Transport police reduced. I doubt whether the Government intended that that should be part of the economies which British Rail introduced. Therefore, will the Minister consider telling the British Railways Board that the level of the police establishment should not be included in any review of expenditure which it undertakes? The British Transport police need more officers, not fewer, if they are to be effective in maintaining good order on London transport and British Rail. More mobile squads are required to combat tube violence, and more British Transport police officers are needed on trains and at mainline stations.

If the British Transport police establishment cannot be maintained and increased as I have suggested, we can expect public disorder. If the Minister thinks that I am exaggerating, I assure him that because of the impossibility of providing police cover, especially at weekends, some stations have had to be closed recently. In those circumstances, damage may result to British Rail property and people may be injured. The establishment is understaffed now and a further reduction would have a serious effect.

My second reason for initiating the debate is that Associated British Ports proposes to terminate the use of British Transport policemen at its ports. It is a private limited company and is therefore entitled to take that action if it wishes. It has said that the reasons are entirely based on cost. Instead, it will engage a private firm. There is no doubt that if it does that there will be a reduction in the standard of protection of the property of customers of Associated British Ports.

Many people will say that that matter is between Associated British Ports and its customers. However, there are matters of public policy involved. The Government cannot entirely escape from some responsibility in this area. If the ports are not properly policed, the opportunity for drug smuggling will be increased. In case the House thinks again that I am exaggerating, I shall illustrate my point. Recently at the port of Dover people carrying 5·5 kilos of cannabis were arrested. If British Transport police cover at ports is withdrawn, criminals will move to Southampton or other ABP ports. There will be no effective cover to discourage them.

I am worried about the importation not only of drugs but of rabies. A lack of policing will make it easier to bring in animals. Terrorists will have a greater freedom to come and go. Illegal immigrants will have a greater chance of entering the country through unpoliced ports. It is clear that such a move would cause considerable problems. The specialised expertise of the British Transport police should be kept intact to counteract those dangers.

About 200 police officers are involved in the policing of British ports. Although some of them will be retained in the form of emergency mobile squads, there is no doubt that if the Government stand by while the force is disbanded it will be an abnegation of their responsibility.

If the only solution to the problem of keeping the force intact to continue in the service of the people is that British Transport policemen be absorbed into local county constabularies, I do not believe that British Transport police would stand in the way of such a move. The alternative is to provide open house to criminals at ports. I do not believe that anyone would wish that to happen.

I know that chief constables will be inclined to say, "If we are to take British Transport police officers into our county constabularies, we will do it only provided we are given some assurance about the additional cost which will fall upon our county constabularies." They may say that they will be prepared to do so only if their overall establishment is suitably increased.

All those matters must be faced, but we cannot drift up to 30 June 1985, which is the date upon which effective police cover will be withdrawn from the ports, and then discover that we have left our ports wide open to all the difficulties and dangers to which I have drawn attention.

I have raised these matters today because, first, I am calling upon my hon. Friend the Minister to set up a review of his Department's insistence that there should be a cut in the forces employed at British Rail premises and on London underground. I hope that I have said sufficient to persuade my hon. Friend that, far from contemplating a reduction in the establishment on London underground and British Rail, we should be looking to increase it if the public is to be protected. Secondly, I seek Government help to keep the British Transport police who are at present available at ports around the country to ensure that law enforcement is advanced. If that can be done only by absorbing the officers into county forces, so be it.

I have the support of a number of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. As they cannot be here, I have been asked by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who are sponsored members of the Transport Salaried Staffs Association, to say that I have their support in bringing these matters before the House. I hope that they will receive my hon. Friend's sympathetic consideration.

2.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) started his Adjournment debate by mentioning all the good work done by the British Transport police. I join him in that comment and emphasise my admiration for the quiet, effective and unobtrusive way in which officers of the British Transport police carry out their duties.

I am obliged to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to recent developments in the policing of the ports. In the light of events it is entirely understandable that British Transport police officers should have expressed concern over the future of their force. However, I must make it clear from the outset that the establishment and deployment of the British Transport police is a matter not for the Government, but for the British Railways Board, and for the other organisations making use of their services. Nevertheless, I have made inquiries to establish the background to the decision taken by Associated British Ports, to which my hon. Friend referred, to dispense with the services of the British Transport police by 30 June 1985.

The British Transport police at present operate in 13 of the 19 ports now owned by Associated British Ports. The British Railways Board, as employer of the police, makes their services available to Associated British Ports on a repayment basis.

The origins of the policing arrangement are that the British Transport police provided a policing service to the old British Transport Commission. The commission was abolished in 1962 in favour of four separate transport boards — the British Railways Board, the London Transport Board, the British Transport Docks Board and the British Waterways Board; the British Railways Board as the main user of police services took over responsibility as employer of the force, co–ordinating its interests with those of London Transport and the British Transport Docks Board through the British Transport Police Force Scheme 1963, the British Waterways Board having opted out of the scheme.

The 1963 scheme provided for all transport police to be appointed and employed by the British Railways Board, and established the title of chief constable for the chief officer of the British Transport police. It also made provision for a British Transport police committee with a chairman and other representatives drawn from the British Railways Board, but also with one member drawn from each of the other transport boards requiring the services of the force. The committee's terms of reference include the supervision of the administration of the force, and the provision of advice to the boards in respect of any matter relating to the British Transport Police.

The British Transport Docks Board was reconstituted at the end of 1982, as Associated British Ports, owned by a parent company, Associated British Ports Holdings, which is now wholly owned by private interests. Associated British Ports inherited the range of statutory powers needed to operate in the British Transport Docks Board's ports, which, among other things, allowed existing policing arrangements to continue. Nothing in the statutes required Associated British Ports to use the services of the British Transport police, though it has done so until now, making repayment to the British Railways Board of the costs involved. However, Associated British Ports has recently reviewed its arrangements. Its resulting decision to dispense with the services of the British Transport police is, I must stress, a commercial matter entirely for Associated British Ports.

The implications of that decision, and in particular its impact on police deployment and total establishment, will need to be examined carefully by the British Railways Board and the British Transport police committee. I understand that the chief constable of the British Transport police has made a detailed assessment of the situation which will assist them in that examination. I should emphasise that these are considerations which are proper either to the police committee, or to the British Railways Board as the employer of the police, and the Government have no power to influence the outcome.

A number of stories have been circulating which suggest that the withdrawal of the British Transport police from some ports will result in an increase in organised crime, including drug trafficking. These assertions stray some way from reality, and in any case ignore the fact that even now not all the ports owned by Associated British Ports are policed by this force. The investigation of criminal offences committed on the property of Associated British Ports can, as with any other private organisation, be undertaken by the local county police. It should be remembered that these are precisely the arrangements which exist in the dozens of ports not served by the British Transport police or having their own individual ports police force.

Mr. McCrindle: I understand that my hon. Friend is replying to the debate as the Under-Secretary of State for Transport. Can he, at the very least, give an undertaking that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will have a word with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, whose interest in the more general aspects of maintaining law and order are such as perhaps to make him more interested than my hon. Friend has implied he is in what might happen if these ports become de-policed?

Mr. Mitchell: That is a reasonable request, and I shall take steps to see that, in one form or other, the implications of the changes that are under way, and any other changes that might develop, are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary so that he can take account of them and of their effect on the general policing requirements in the county forces in the vicinity of such changes. However, when my hon. Friend refers to Associated British Ports ending the financial arrangement for its internal policing to be carried out by the British Transport police as an open house for criminals, that perhaps is going a little further than my hon. Friend will on reflection feel appropriate.

I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that neither the Clyde nor the Forth has such policing arrangements. I know that north of the border they are very law abiding, but I should have thought that even in those two ports there might be similar problems to those drawn attention to by my hon. Friend. Nearer home to him, in Ipswich, there is no such system. Nor is there in the huge port of Sullom Voe, which handles so much of our oil shipments. Nor is there on the Tyne, and nor is there in Sunderland. We are not exactly going into wholly uncharted waters with the proposal of Associated British Ports that it should bring itself into line with the other ports to which I have referred.

The police authorities and chief constables of civil forces whose areas contain ports from which the British Transport police are to be withdrawn will no doubt be considering with Associated British Ports the extent of the policing commitment required, and laying plans for meeting this. As far as customs requirements are concerned, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise will, I am sure, also be seeking discussions with Associated British Ports to satisfy itself on a port-by-port basis that adequate alternative security arrangements are being provided. Quarantine regulations are the responsibility of the local authorities, and they will no doubt be considering the implications of ABP's decisions and what alternative arrangements might be needed.

The suggestion that one solution to the difficulties on surplus police manpower created by ABP's decision would be to second BTP officers currently serving in the docks to the various county police forces is a helpful one. In principle there is nothing to prevent this happening, though in practice it is not clear that it would necessarily provide a universal solution to whatever additional policing requirements may fall on individual county police forces. But it certainly merits consideration by the parties involved: the British Railways Board, the British Transport police committee, the police authorities, which have the responsibility for setting their establishments—subject to the Home Secretary's approval—and the chief constables, who would need to agree on numbers, ranks and individuals to be absorbed.

Looking beyond the immediate context of Associated British Ports' decision, questions have been raised about the long-term future of the British Transport police. My hon. Friend drew attention to that. I have concentrated specifically on Associated British Ports and the more immediate impact of its decision, but I understand the underlying anxiety that my hon. Friend expressed, and it is right that I should seek to respond to it.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to place on record my own appreciation and admiration of the professionalism and competence of the British Transport police, but I have to say that any assurances about the future, or indeed and decision for change, must emanate from the users of the service. It is emphatically not the responsibility of the Government to lead either the British Railways Board or the British Transport police committee towards conclusions in this area. Perhaps all that I can usefully add—and I hope this is helpful—is that I am not aware of any major changes planned for the British Transport police, though this is not to say that the future establishment will not need to be revised in the light of future trends and commercial requirements. I can further tell the House that the British Railways Board and the chief constable of the British Transport police are fully seized of the impact on the morale of the force which has been caused by the uncertainties following Associated British Ports' decision and that they are therefore doing all in their power to conclude their assessment, which I mentioned earlier, as quickly as possible.

I understand that quite recently an Opposition spokesman suggested that the Government had decided that it was best to privatise our police forces in the docks. I assure the House that this has nothing to do with the Government. Decisions taken in this area are within the competence of those taking them. The Government are not a party thereto. Therefore, I hope my hon. Friend will feel that he has performed, as I believe he has, a valuable task in drawing attention to the perfectly understandable human reactions to change within the British Transport police force and the anxieties raised by the ABP decision. However, in the light of what I have been able to say, I hope my hon. Friend will feel that it would be right and proper for the House now to adjourn.

Mr. McCrindle: I agree that it would be right and proper for the House to adjourn, but before we do so can my hon. Friend give me one other small undertaking, which I suspect will be easy? Will he have a word with London Regional Transport about the staffing levels on underground trains, which, as he must know from correspondence addressed to his Department, continue to raise concern among both staff and the travelling public? If he were to undertake to have a word with LRT about the continuing effectiveness of the establishment, I believe that I shall have done well in raising this Adjournment debate.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend will know that LRT is one of the responsibilities of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport. I shall draw her attention to the point that my hon. Friend has just made. That would be the right channel of communication. It would be the most effective way for this matter to be drawn to the attention of those concerned.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 3 December 1984

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Court (Bradford)

Mr. Lawler asked the Attorney-General when the new Crown court building in Bradford will be constructed.

The Solicitor-General: It is the Government's firm intention to provide a new Crown court centre in Bradford. A number of possible sites are under consideration. It is not yet possible to give an estimated date for the completion of the scheme.

Magistrates (Newcastle upon Tyne)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General how many attendances at petty sessions there were by each magistrate for the city of Newcastle upon Tyne for the last year.

The Solicitor-General: The information required cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost, but I will see that the hon. Member receives the latest available figures for the 12 month period ending 30 September 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General what was, for each of the last three years, the number of magistrates for the city of Newcastle upon Tyne who have attended fewer than 26 petty sessions, together with the number who have attended fewer than 26 sessions per year for more than one year.

The Solicitor-General: 1980-81, 52; 1981-82, 23; 1982-83, 40. Twenty-four attended fewer than 26 times per year for more than one year. These figures include justices newly appointed or who resigned or retired within the periods, and those who suffered ill-health or were granted leave of absence.

Advisory Committees on the Appointment of Magistrates

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General whether the two advisory committees on the appointment of magistrates which disclose their membership to the public have encountered any difficulties arising from so doing.

The Solicitor-General: So far as is known, no.

North London Polytechnic Student Union

Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if he will consider bringing proceedings against the student union of the North London polytechnic for its use of student union funds to contribute £1,000 to striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: The Treasury Solicitor is investigating this matter. If a payment has been made in breach of trust I shall consider bringing civil proceedings against those responsible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mr. Mohammed Siddique

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Mohammed Siddique, who is an unconvicted prisoner on remand at Winson Green prison, was told that he could not wear his own shirt during the period of relaxation outside his prison cell and subsequently instructed to return to his cell.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Stop and Search Statistics

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply the monthly total by district for (a) the number of stop and searches undertaken by Metropolitan police officers for the period January 1983 to September 1984, (b) the number of arrests arising from these stop and searches for the same period and (c) the number of charges, broken down by offence, arising from these stop and searches for the same period.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the available information is as given in the following table. The table shows the number of persons or vehicles recorded as stopped; figures for stops of persons and stops of vehicles are not separately identifiable. Statistics showing the number of occasions on which a search was conducted are not available. Monthly figures and details of charges are not collected centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Note: The figures are rounded because they are based on information recorded in station registers for operational purposes which is unsuitable for the preparation of statistical summaries. Components may not add to the total because they have been rounded independently.

Race Relations Act

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if the Government have any plans to repeal the Race Relations Act.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Prisons (Sanitation)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons are due for refurbishment in current programmes; and in how many night sanitation facilities will be provided.

Mr. Mellor: Major capital work is in progress or planned at 100 existing prison department establishments. When this programme is completed, access to night sanitation will be available in whole or in part at 96 establishments.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason it was decided not to provide night sanitation facilities during the planned refurbishment of C wing at Parkhurst prison.

Mr. Mellor: The work to be carried out on 'C' wing at this stage is the minimum necessary to reinstate the therapeutic unit in the wing as soon as possible. Night sanitation will ultimately be provided in all four wings at Parkhurst. But to provide such facilities in 'C' wing at this stage would delay the reopening of the therapeutic unit, and would have serious implications for the other major redevelopment schemes at the prison.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons presently provide access to how many prisoners to night sanitation facilities.

Mr. Mellor: About 17,000 places in a total of 70 prison department establishments at present provide access to night sanitation.

Prisons (Emergency Apparatus)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is standard practice to situate breathing apparatus for emergency use in all penal establishments.

Mr. Mellor: Self-contained breathing apparatus is not currently available in prison department establishments. However, it is proposed to introduce it on a trial basis at three establishments in the near future.

European Parliament (Members' Salaries and Allowances)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make it his practice to collect information on the salaries and allowances payable to British Members of the European Parliament;

(2) on what date since 2 July 1981 Her Majesty's Government discontinued the practice of answering in full parliamentary questions on the comparable salary and allowances payable to United Kingdom Members of Parliament and British Members of the European Parliament.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Warning and Monitoring Organisation

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are any plans to construct a fallback headquarters for the Caledonian sector of the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Metropolitan Police (Clear-up Rates)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether the published figures for clear-up rates in the Metropolitan police area for the first six months of 1984 include any changes which result from the experiment referred to in his written answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 493;

(2) what has been the clear-up rate for murder in the Metropolitan police area in each of the last five years; and what it has been in the three police authority areas with the best clear-up rate for murder and the three areas with the worst, excluding the Metropolitan and City of London police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Transfer of Prisoners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what are the administrative arrangements for the transfer of prisoners between (a) England and Scotland and (b) England and Northern Ireland; and how many prisoners have been transferred in the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what are the administrative arrangements covering the transfer of prisoners between (a) England and the Channel Islands and (b) England and the Isle of Man; and how many prisoners have been transferred in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: There are powers under the Criminal Justice Act 1961 to transfer a sentenced prisoner on his own application between England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, or to the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, either permanently or temporarily. Prisoners sentenced in the Channel Islands or Isle of Man may be transferred permanently without their application; this is because of the limited facilities on the islands, particularly for long-term prisoners. There are also powers to transfer sentenced prisoners to face trial, and prisoners (whether sentenced or not) for other judicial purposes; these transfers do not require an application from the prisoner.

Transfers are made by order of the Secretary of State for the jurisdiction in which the prisoner is held initially, in agreement with the authorities in the receiving jurisdictions. Transfers from the Channel Islands and Isle of Man are made by order of the Home Secretary, with the agreement of the island authorities. The detailed arrangements are described in circular instruction 1/1978, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

The statistical information requested is not immediately available, and I will publish it in the Official Report.

WALES

Heroin Addiction (North Wales)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales, what is his estimate of the number of heroin addicts in north Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Because of the nature of the activity it is not possible to make reliable estimates of the total numbers of heroin users in particular localities. Information available about addicts notified to the chief medical officer at the Home Office by medical practitioners in accordance with statutory requirements shows that notifications of 16 new addicts and two former addicts claiming addiction to heroin in north Wales were received during 1983. Recent research commissioned by DHSS in two urban areas suggests that the figures derived from notifications in those areas may be an under-estimate to at least a five-fold degree, although it is not clear how more generally applicable this finding may be.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Butcher: The grants given by my Department to various non-statutory bodies are shown in the Supply Estimates and revised Supply Estimates for 1984-85, for class IV, votes 2, 4, and 6.

Leeward Islands Air Transport (Aircraft)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will support an application by British Aerospace for assistance under the trade and aid provisions to enable Leeward Islands Air Transport to purchase the Super 748s it wants rather than the French aircraft insisted upon by the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: It would not be appropriate to provide assistance to BAe under the aid and trade provision while discussions between Leeward Islands Air Transport and the EC Commission are continuing. The Government are keeping a close watch on the position.

British Technology Group

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list since 1981 the British Technology Group investments made in companies producing electro-deposited copper foil with a treatment layer compatible with bonding to laminates or similar process and state (a) the names of the companies, (b) the amount of the investment and (c) the reasons for the investment.

Mr. Butcher: In 1983 the British Technology Group approved a loan of £100,000 to Electrofoils Ltd. as part of its technology transfer activities.

BT (Flotation)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated total value of the special concessions being offered to purchasers of British Telecom shares.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on 27 November.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated total value of the incentives offered to British Telecom's employees to encourage them to purchase shares, assuming all employees take full advantage of the offers made to them; and if he will publish in the Official Report, when the information is available, details of the number of employees who bought shares, and the total value of the concessions they obtained.

Mr. Butcher: British Telecom has 241,000 employees, the vast majority of whom are eligible for incentives. The terms of the offer to employees are set out in the prospectus and in my reply of 27 November to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will request those stockbrokers and other retailers of British Telecom shares who are sharing with charities the 2 per cent. commission they are being paid by the Government to inform him of the proportion of the commission they have given to which charity; and if he will publish the information when it becomes available in the Official Report.

Mr. Butcher: It would not be appropriate for the Government to seek information about gifts intermediaries participating in the British Telecom flotation are making to charities.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report when details are available how much of the money paid to the City institutions in connection with the sale of British Telecom shares went to (a) underwriters (b) retailers of the shares; and if he will list any arrangements made for the sale which have not been common for the sale of shares on previous occasions.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply of 27 November to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). Many features of the British Telecom flotation listed there have not been common to the sale of shares on previous occasions.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the additional revenue which would have accrued to the Government if all the British Telecom shares sold by 3 December had been paid for in full on that day and not by instalments.

Mr. Butcher: The Government do not believe it would have been possible to make a flotation of this size at a satisfactory price if payment had been required in full at the time of the offer.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the cost to (a) public funds and (b) British Telecom of administering the sale of British Telecom shares.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave on 27 November to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). The expenses of the offer for sale to be borne by British Telecom are estimated in the prospectus to be £8·4 million exclusive of VAT.

BT (Exchange Equipment)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of British Telecom's telephone exchanges rely largely on electromechanical equipment; how many use digital equipment; and what is the estimated cost of equipping an average exchange with digital equipment.

Mr. Butcher: As is stated in the British Telecom prospectus, the numbers and types of British Telecom's telephone exchanges on 31 March 1984 were as follows:

	Local exchanges	Trunk exchanges	International exchanges
Strowger	3,708	331	—
Crossbar	571	126	6
TXE	1,965	—	—
Digital	48	2	1
Total	6,292	459	7

No estimate of the kind the right hon. Member seeks is available. However, BT's modernisation programme involves the installation of digital switching throughout the trunk network during the 1980s and the replacement of electromechanical local exchanges by TXE and, increasingly, digital local exchanges over the next 10 years.

Falmouth Shiprepair Ltd.

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, before giving his approval for the return of Falmouth Shiprepair Ltd. to the private sector, he will satisfy himself that the recommended bid is judged on the future of the yard and its work force as much as on the size of the largest offer; and if he will make a statement on the progress of the sale and the likely date of an announcement identifying the new owners.

Mr. Butcher: I can confirm that the future of Falmouth Shiprepair Ltd. and its work force will be taken into account before consent is given to its sale. Negotiations are continuing and I am unable to give a date for the announcement of the new owners.

Knowsley (Financial Aid)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list all financial aid from central Government and the European Commission direct to industry in the borough of Knowsley during 1984-85 showing the amount involved in each category;

(2) what is the value of regional development grants and selective financial assistance to Knowsley in 1984-85; what was their value in 1983-84; what their estimated value will be in 1985-86 and 1986-87; and what form this assistance will take following his statement of 28 November to the House;

(3) how he envisages the changes in the Government's regional industrial policy will affect Merseyside over the next three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Ravendale Securities

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set up an investigation under the Prevention of Fraud (Investment) Act 1958 into the operations of Ravendale Securities and its associates in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes, if I judge that an investigation is needed.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many dealing licences have been issued to Ravendale Securities and associated people and companies.

Mr. Fletcher: Five principal's licences are held by companies within the Ravendale group. In addition 10 individuals hold representative licences as employees or agents of those companies.

Licensed Dealers

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if, following a review by his Department, any licences to deal in securities have been revoked;

(2) how many applications to become licensed dealers have been approved and how many rejected in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The number of licences granted under section 3 of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 in each year since 1979—excluding renewals—is as follows:

	Principal's licences	Representative's licences
1979	37	160
1980	56	205
1982	88	280
1983	225	506
*1984	176	691

* To date.

From 1 January 1983 to date there have been 21 refusals or revocations of principal's licences. This figure does not include licences which holders have allowed to lapse or applications rejected as incomplete. Information about earlier years and representative licences is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any of the self-regulatory organisations of dealers in securities have applied for a block deal.

Mr. Fletcher: The law empowers me to grant an order of recognition only to an individual association of dealers in securities or stock exchange.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the stringency of the requirements for members of the self-regulatory bodies whose members deal in securities.

Mr. Fletcher: I am generally satisfied with the standards maintained by these bodies. Although there have been some complaints against their members, they are few and far between.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list all the self-regulatory bodies whose members are dealers in securities exempted from his Department's regulations for licensed dealers;

(2) if he will list all the members of all the self-regulatory bodies whose members are dealers in securities exempted from his Department's regulations for licensed dealers.

Mr. Fletcher: The associations of dealers in securities recognised under section 15 of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act are listed, as is the Stock Exchange, in my Department's publication "Dealers in Securities and Authorised Unit Trust Schemes, 1984". This volume also lists the members of five of the nine bodies in question. The membership lists of the other four are excluded on space and cost grounds, but are available for inspection.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the vetting by his Department of applications to become licenced dealers includes checking on the applicants and their associates with comparable agencies in the United States of America and Europe.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes. If the applicant has carried on business abroad or persons (legal or natural) who are based abroad are likely to be able to exercise a material influence over the applicant's business.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications to become licensed dealers have been received by his Department in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The following numbers of applications for licences to deal in securities have been received:

	Principals licence applications	Representative licence applications
1983	247	591

Figures for earlier years are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is the average age of the inspectors in his Department engaged in vetting applications to become licensed dealers;

(2) how many inspectors in his Department are engaged in vetting applications to set up as licensed dealers.

Mr. Fletcher: There are eleven staff directly engaged in the vetting of applications for licences to deal in securities. Their mean average age is 31·9 years.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints have been received, on average, about any one licensed dealer by his Department in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The great majority of licensed dealer firms do not give rise to any complaints to my Department. In 1983, 34 complaints were received about 12 firms. In 1984 to date there have been 50 complaints about 11 firms. Figures about complaints received in earlier years are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how often licences to deal in securities are reviewed.

Mr. Fletcher: Each year when they fall due for renewal. Otherwise, whenever there is any complaint or change in circumstances (eg changes of directors) which might call into question the continued fitness of the licence holder.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the criteria which must be met by an applicant for a licence to deal in shares.

Mr. Fletcher: Under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 a licence must be granted unless I have reason to suppose that the applicant is not a fit and proper person to hold a licence. Section 5(2) of the Act sets out the matters to which I can have regard in forming such a view.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the regulations governing brokers and dealers in the United States of America; and how they compare with the regulations governing licensed dealers in shares in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fletcher: My Department has copies of the regulations in question. They have much in common with the United Kingdom rules and regulations governing licensed dealers.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the stringency of his Department's regulations concerning licensed dealers in shares: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes. The Licensed Dealers (Conduct of Business) Rules and the Dealers in Securities (Licensing Regulations) were radically revised last year. I have no reason to suppose that, within the limits of my present powers, the rules and regulations are wanting in stringency.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many licensed dealers have been investigated under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: Since 1980 the following numbers of licensed dealers have been investigated under Section 109 of the Companies Act 1967:

	Number
1980	2
1981	3
1982	1
1983	6
1984*	1

* to date

The figure for 1979 is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the figures for (a) bankruptcies and (b) liquidations of licensed dealers in shares for each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: I regret that this information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. A specific obligation on licensed dealers to notify my Department of bankruptcy and liquidation proceedings was introduced in the Dealers in Securities (Licensing) Regulations 1983. There is, however, no obligation to notify this information after a licence has been revoked or has lapsed.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if the criteria for membership of self-regulatory bodies dealing in securities is equivalent to becoming a licensed dealer under his Department's regulations;

(2) what are the criteria for becoming a self-regulatory body whose members are dealers in securities, exempted from his Department's regulations for licensed dealers;

(3) if the membership requirements of the self-regulatory bodies whose members deal in securities exempt those members from his Department's regulations.

Mr. Fletcher: The exemption of members of a body depends upon the body being recognised under section 15 of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act. There are no explicit statutory criteria for recognition. Since it involves, in effect, the delegation of the Secretary of State's own regulatory responsibilities the criteria employed amount essentially, to membership requirements, conduct of business rules, and enforcement affording to standard of investor protection at least equivalent, overall, to that which we seek to maintain under the statutory system for licensed dealers.

Fraud (Prosecutions)

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many successful prosecutions under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 have been brought by his Department since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: My Department has successfully prosecuted offences under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 as follows:

1979 No cases
1980 2 cases (Section 14)
1981 1 case (Section 14)
1982 1 case (Sections 1 and 14)
1983 No cases
1984 (to date) 1 case (Sections 1 and 14) Others pending.

Charges under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act are commonly not proceeded with where more serious charges are available.

Manchester International Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effect for Manchester international airport of the decisions on regional aid announced by the Minister of State on 28 November and, in particular, on whether aid from the European regional development fund will still be available for the further development of the airport.

Mr. Trippier: I will reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Companies (Take-overs)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to prevent the take-over by large international conglomerates of smaller British companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The merger control provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973 provide for take-overs to be considered on a case-by-case basis.

EC (Industrial Aid)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on state aids to industry within the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 29 November 1984, c. 548]: The Government will continue to support the Commission in the firm and even-handed application of the provisions of the Treaty of Rome relating to state aids.

PRIME MINISTER

Government Offices (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will make a further statement on the proposals for relocating the Manchester offices of Government Departments.

The Prime Minister: No decision has yet been taken on the future location of certain Government offices in central Manchester, but it is not proposed to relocate them outside the city centre.

Cancer (Prevention and Control)

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Prime Minister which Government Departments have significant involvement in the primary prevention of cancer; what policy they have for the co-ordination of their activities; what policies they have published jointly or separately for the primary prevention of cancer; and what proposals Her Majesty's Government have for a national governmental body of cancer control to promote the primary prevention of cancer.

The Prime Minister: The Government Departments which have a significant involvement in the primary prevention of cancer are the United Kingdom Health Departments, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Environment Department and the Health and Safety Commission.

The primary prevention of cancer strategy involved control of carcinogenic substances in the environment and workplace and the health education of the public. The Health and Safety Commission advises the Government on the control of hazardous substances at work including carcinogens. There are strict controls on the levels of carcinogens and radiation in the environment and on potentially hazardous substances in food and consumer products. Health education measures include advice on smoking and diet and on preventive health screening for specific cancers.

The Government believe that the present departmental arrangements to co-ordinate and promote the primary prevention of cancer are satisfactory and have no plans to introduce different administrative arrangements.

Asbestos

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Prime Minister which Government Departments are actively involved in the control of environmental pollution by asbestos; approximately what is the average number of asbestos fibres inhaled by a child each hour in urban air and in rural air in Britain; above what level of asbestos fibres in air, expressed as the approximate number of asbestos figures per cubic metre of air, the Government Departments concerned regard as unreasonable environmental asbestos pollution; and what official national and international standards have been set for the control of environmental asbestos polluting to protect members of the general public.

The Prime Minister: The Department of the Environment takes the lead in the control of environmental pollution by asbestos. The Department of Education and Science is concerned with asbestos in schools and the Department of Health and Social Security is concerned with asbestos in hospitals. The Department of Trade and Industry has responsibility for asbestos in consumer products and the Health and Safety Executive regulates asbestos emissions from factories. The Welsh Office, Scottish Office and Northern Ireland Office are responsible for these matters in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Measurements of asbestos fibre concentrations in the environment differ widely and are subject to considerable uncertainties. No meaningful estimate of the number of fibres inhaled by a child can be given. The Department of the Environment does not consider that the number of airborne asbestos fibres measured in an "environmental" situation by itself is a reasonable basis for controlling the risk to the general public. The Department advises that environmental concentration of airborne asbestos fibres should be kept as low as is reasonably practicable.

It follows that no national standard has been set for ambient air quality nor am I aware of such a standard having been set in any other country.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Prime Minister which Government Department has the principal interest in the control of environmental asbestos pollution; and what published advice is available or what unpublished instructions there are in this regard from the Department concerned for the control of environmental asbestos pollution.

The Prime Minister: The Department of the Environment has the principal responsibility for the control of environmental asbestos pollution. It issued advice on this subject in its booklet "Asbestos Materials in Buildings", which was sent to all local authorities (in England and Wales) with circular DOE 21/83 (WO.45/83) in August last year. The booklet is also available from HMSO. Advice to householders was published in December last year in the free leaflet "Asbestos in Housing", over 300,000 copies of which have been distributed.

The Department has also published guidance on waste disposal in two Waste Management Papers No. 18, titled "Asbestos Wastes", and No. 23 titled "Special wastes: a technical memorandum providing guidance on their definition."

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

UNESCO

53. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has yet reached a decision on the United Kingdom's continued membership of the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced during the debate on overseas aid on 22 November that the Government had decided to submit notice of withdrawal which, unless rescinded, would take effect on 31 December 1985. We shall reconsider our position towards the end of next year in the light of the progress made towards reform.

Ethiopia

54. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representations he has received to date about aid to Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: Since the beginning of October, more than 2,700. The Government share the widespread public concern about the famine in Ethiopia.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to how much supplementary food and edible oil the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission in Ethiopia estimates is needed to deal with famine relief in Ethiopia for the next 12 months and as to how much has now been offered by the donor communities.

Mr. Raison: The Relief and Rehabilitation Commission estimated, in October 1984, that 33,605 tonnes of supplementary foods and 12,060 tonnes of edible oil would be required in the period till the end of 1985. We do not yet know what donors' pledges for 1985 will be.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the most recent estimates of the amount of grain that will arrive at the Port of Assab in Ethiopia for each of the next eight weeks, and as to how much will be in store at the port in each of those weeks.

Mr. Raison: The World Food Programme expects 112,599 tonnes to arrive at Ethiopian ports or at Djibouti in December, and 94,430 tonnes in January. It is not practicable to forecast these arrivals week by week, nor to forecast the precise rate of evacuation from the port at a time when other essential imports (e.g. fertiliser) will also be arriving or consequently to assess the amounts likely to be in store at Assab. The figures include grain from all sources, and their accuracy will depend on the notification to WFP by both the many aid donors and by commercial suppliers.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new proposals for long-term aid to Ethiopia he is considering following the visit to Ethiopia of the Minister for Overseas Development.

Mr. Raison: No proposals for long-term aid were put to me by the Government of Ethiopia during my visit. I shall be considering with our partners in the European Community how we might help most effectively, taking into account any satisfactory programmes agreed between the Government of Ethiopia and the World Bank.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent he is employing the resources and expertise of the Crown Agents in the logistics of obtaining and transporting supplies to assist in the famine situation in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: We are using the Crown Agents in Kenya to obtain relief items for Save the Children Fund and Oxfam.

Council of Development Ministers

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent meetings of the Council of Development Ministers in Brussels.

Mr. Raison: The Council of Development Ministers met on 6 November 1984 in Brussels. At the United Kingdom's request, the main topic of discussion was the Community response to the famine in Ethiopia and other African countries. The Council endorsed an addition of 32 million ecu (£19 million) to the Community aid budget for this purpose. I urged early agreement on the Community's 1985 food aid programme and concentration of food aid on emergency needs.

Nicaragua

56. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total amount of aid to Nicaragua in the current year; and what is the planned amount for 1985-86.

Mr. Raison: I expect bilateral aid to Nicaragua to amount to £25,000 in this financial year and to be at about the same level in 1985-86.

Famine Relief

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to consult other Commonwealth Governments on longer-term measures to prevent famines elsewhere, in view of the famine in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: As part of our normal activities we play a full part in consultative and coordination arrangements involving aid giving countries and agencies and the Governments of recipient countries. Longer-term development policies and investments in the agricultural and related sector occupy an important part in these discussions.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how he determines priorities for spending within his Department's budget.

Mr. Raison: Priorities for spending the aid programme are decided primarily in the light of our developmental objectives. Bilateral aid is concentrated on the poorest developing countries. Account is also taken of political and commercial considerations, as well as of emergencies.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, whether it is his policy to ensure that wherever possible generic drugs are used in health projects under the aid programme.

Mr. Raison: I confirm that we would advocate the use of generic drugs wherever this is possible.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people have been charged as a result of incidents arising from the miners' strike.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In the period between 14 March and 16 September 1984, 1,342 persons were arrested and charged with offences arising from the mining dispute.

Mr. Soley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what has been the number of written complaints about police conduct during the mining dispute received in each police force area; and what has been the general nature of these complaints.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Inquiry with procurators fiscal and through them with the chief constables of those forces which have had to deal with incidents arising out of the present mining dispute indicate that 13 written complaints about police conduct have been received. The complaints either relate to police tactics in general or involve allegations about the conduct of individual police officers.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost in the present and in the next financial year of mortgage interest relief at the standard and at higher rates of tax.

Mr. Moore: The cost of mortgage interest relief in 1984-85 is estimated to be about £3·5 billion including about £180 million at rates in excess of the basic rate. It would be premature to provide an estimate for 1985-86, since the cost will depend on the amounts of mortgage lending and interest rates as well as on the 1985-86 income tax rates and bands.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Hayhoe: No grants to voluntary organisations are made by my Department.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many drug dogs and handlers are employed by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; what is the extent of their training; and what is the annual cost of maintaining this part of the service.

Mr. Hayhoe: Twenty-nine drug dog teams are currently employed. In addition to their normal training as customs officers, drug dog handlers attend a 15-week course at the RAF police school, Newton, which is designed to train them to use dogs to find prohibited drugs. The cost for the year ending 31 March 1984 was about £450,000 including capital and training costs.

National Union of Mineworkers

Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Registrar of Friendly Societies is taking to ensure that the National Union of Mineworkers is complying with its statutory obligations as such a society.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 provides that no trade union can be registered under the Friendly Societies Act 1974. The functions relating to trade unions which were formerly performed by the Chief Registrar are now performed by the Certification Officer in accordance with the Employment Protection Act 1975.

Value Added Tax (Books)

Mr. Murphy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he is planning to have regarding possible imposition of value added tax on books, newspapers and periodicals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Ministers have received a large number of representations on this subject from interested trade associations, other organisations and individuals and a number of meetings have been held or are planned; in other cases requests for meetings are being considered. I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on 15 November at column 322.

Customs and Excise (Confiscated Books)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the answer of 26 November, Official Report, whether the court cases referred to involve the Obscene Publications Acts, the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 and the Customs (Consolidation) Act 1876; whether the instructions were in writing; and if he will publish them.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Business Expansion Scheme

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the companies which currently have an approved fund established under the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the categories of, and the actual commodities or services concerned or referred to directly or indirectly, in the reasoned opinion he has received from the Commission of the European Communities in respect of article 169 of the Treaty of Rome, referred to in the reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 28 November, Official Report, column 476; and if he will place a copy of the communication and any reply by Her Majesty's Government in the Library.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensions

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to seek powers to tax lump sum superannuation benefits; what representations he has received on the subject; how many have been favourable and how many unfavourable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984; c. 606]: As to our intentions, I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 12 November [illegible] at column 90. To date about 300 letters have been received, in addition to representations from various trade associations and representative bodies. Almost all have expressed opposition to such a change.

THE ARTS

Repertory Theatres

Mrs. Reneé Short asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what level of funding has been allocated to repertory theatres of similar size to the Royal Exchange theatre in Manchester during the last three years.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984, c. 604: The Haymarket theatre, Leicester, the Bristol Old Vic and the Nottingham Playhouse theatres are of similar size to the Royal Exchange theatre in Manchester. Their seating capacity, and their grants from the Arts Council in the last three years are listed as follows:

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Grants

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish an estimate of the total cost of student grants in 1985-86 following the changes announced on 14 November, together with an estimate of the total value of the savings expected to result from those changes.

Mr. Brooke: The total cost of students' mandatory awards in 1985-86 is estimated to be about £683 million. The total value of savings from the changes announced is estimated at £40 million; after forecast increases in expenditure resulting from increases in the average cost of awards and in the number of students holding mandatory awards have been offset the estimated net saving is £25 million.

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he is planning to have as a consequence of the proposed changes to student grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Government do not consult on matters concerning the public expenditure survey. However, as part of the annual review of the mandatory awards regulations the Department invited and has received submissions from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, the local authority associations and the NUS on the changes to be made to the regulations next year. Officials of the Department have met or will shortly be meeting representatives of all these organisations.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what will be the estimated total cost to parents of the changes (a) to the scale of parental contributions for assessing parents' residual income for student grants and (b) the abolition of the minimum award for the year 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: Forecast savings in the financial year 1985-86 from the change in the parental contribution scale announced on 14 November are £15 million. A further £9 million will be saved from the abolition of the minimum award.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the total cost or the estimated total cost to parents of the assessed contributions to student grants has been in each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The figures in respect of mandatory awards are as follows:

Academic Year	Assessed Parental Contributions £ million
1979-80	84
1980-81	98
1981-82	127
1982-83	155
1984-85	*215

* Forecast

The figures show the assessed parental contribution; many parents are able to take advantage of the covenanting system to reduce their actual contribution.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the total cost to the Government of student maintenance grants, excluding and including fees, has been in each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The figures for mandatory awards are as follows:

Academic Year	Total Public Expenditure Including Fees £ million	Total Public Expenditure Excluding Fees £ million
1979-80	550	332
1980-81	679	398
1981-82	783	443
1982-83	681	472
1983-84	*726	*504
1984-85	*746	*512

* Forecast

These figures are derived from LEA final returns for years up to and including 1982-83 and on provisional returns for 1983-84 and 1984-85. The figures exclude the cost to the Government of tax relief on covenants to parents.

Kirklees (Expenditure)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give a comparison of per capita spending on teaching staff, support staff and books and equipment by Kirklees local education authority with the average per capita spending on those items by each other metropolitan district council local education authority in England.

Mr. Dunn: The information for 1982-83, the latest year for which firm figures are available, is set out in the table. The combined figures for primary and secondary schools are given.

	per pupil expenditure by LEAs (£ 1982-83 prices)

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Sir Keith Joseph: None has been recruited, but four blind employees taken on prior to 1981 remain with the Department. A number of other members of staff suffer from serious sight impairment but are not registered as blind.

St. Martin's and Central Schools of Art (Merger)

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the number of first degree students in fine arts and graphics entering St. Martin's and Central schools of art in the last academic year before their merger and in the first academic year since the merger.

Mr. Brooke: The number of first degree students who commenced courses in fine arts and graphics in the 1983-84 academic year in each of the two colleges was as follows:

	Number
St. Martin's school of art:
CNAA BA Fine Art	67
CNAA BA Graphic Design	43
Central school of art and design:
CNAA BA Fine Art	35
CNAA BA Graphic Design	32

A formal merger between these two institutions has not yet taken place. Some rationalisation of degree courses took place in the 1984-85 academic year, statistics for which are not yet available.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he informed the Council for National Academic Awards in advance that his officials were having discussions on 26 November at St. Martin's college of art with external assessors whose appointment is ratified by the Council for National Academic Awards and with members of the Council for National Academic Awards panel;

(2) what was the purpose of discussions at St. Martin's college of art between his officials and external assessors and members of the Council for National Academic Awards panel;

(3) if he expects external assessors of art colleges and members of the Council for National Academic Awards panel to report direct to him on their assessment of the work being done in particular art colleges.

Mr. Brooke: An official of the Department, Mr. J. H. Thompson, visited St. Martin's school of art on 26 November by arrangement to observe the work of a validation panel which was meeting that day. With the agreement of the principal, he also spoke to members of the college who act as external examiners. The visit and the discussion were in connection with the work of the Lindop committee of inquiry into academic validation in the public sector. Mr. Thompson is the Department's assessor to the committee and his status on the occasion of this visit was made plain to all who spoke to him.

The visit was one of a number being undertaken by all members of the committee to institutions. All visits have the same general purpose. The Council for National Academic Awards, which is co-operating fully with the Lindop committee, is aware that these visits are taking place. My right hon. Friend does not expect external assessors to report to him on their assessments.

Student Funding

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what date and at what time he informed the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals about his proposed changes in student funding.

Mr. Brooke: The Government do not inform outside organisations of their decisions before they are announced to Parliament.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what prior consultation he had with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on his proposed changes in student funding.

Mr. Brooke: The Government do not consult on matters concerning the public expenditure survey. They do, however, consult a number of interested organisations, including the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, on possible changes to the awards regulations and have done so this year as in previous years.

A and O-Levels

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) by how much the proportion of children being educated in grammar schools fell between 1969 and 1982;

(2) by how much the proportion of children passing one or more A-levels rose from 1969 to 1982;

(3) by how much the proportion of children obtaining one or more higher grades at O-level increased between 1969 and 1982;

Mr. Dunn: Between 1969-70 and 1982-83 in England: the proportion of maintained secondary school pupils in grammar schools fell from 19·9 per cent. to 3·1 per cent. (a decrease from 568·5 thousand to 117·1 thousand grammar school pupils); the proportion of young people with one or more A-level passes from schools or further education increased from 16·8 per cent. to 20·4 per cent. (an increase from 103·9 thousand to 161·4 thousand so qualified); the proportion of school leavers obtaining one or more higher grades at O-level/CSE increased from 43·3 per cent. to 54·6 per cent. (an increase from 250·5 thousand to 418·1 thousand).

The proportion of school leavers in England with no graded result at O-level/CSE fell from 43·0 per cent. in 1971-72 to 9·6 per cent. in 1982-83, a fall from 261·1 thousand to 73·6 thousand in those with no O-level or CSE qualification.

ENERGY

European Coal and Steel Community

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what were the total production subsidies to European Coal and Steel Community coal industries in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983;

(2) what was the level of investment finance in European Coal and Steel Community coal industries in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. David Hunt: Details of Community coal investment and production subsidies for the years in question are shown in the Official Journal of the European Community, volumes 24-27, which are available in the Library of the House. The figures make it clear that investment in the United Kingdom coal industry has been about twice the level in the rest of the Community put together. Since production of these figures, France has announced a major programme of reduction in coal producing capacity.

Departmental Staff (Overtime)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many hours' overtime have been worked by employees in his Department not eligible for overtime pay in each of the past three years.

Mr. Peter Walker: No official records of unpaid overtime are kept. I am grateful to those who have on any occasion worked such overtime.

Coal Industry (Denationalisation)

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to denationalise the coal mines at some time in the future.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Civil Nuclear Facilities

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy which of the civil nuclear facilities listed in his reply of 19 November, Official Report, columns 23-4, is designated for inspection under article 78(A) of the tripartite United Kingdom/Euratom/international atomic energy agency treaty.

Mr. Goodlad: The commercial gas centrifuge enrichment plants and associated storage areas at British Nuclear Fuels plc. Capenhurst works have been designated for inspection by the international atomic energy agency under article 78(A) of the agreement between the United Kingdom/Euratom/and the international atomic energy agency.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department's energy efficiency office makes grants to a number of voluntary bodies to promote the insulation of the houses of those requiring such assistance. This expenditure is shown in the 1984-85 Supply Estimates (292-IV) for class IV, vote 5 under "Other Support" on the energy efficiency subhead (D6).

Gas and Electricity Prices

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration has been given by Her Majesty's Government to the effects on high energy users in the engineering foundry industry of the recently announced higher gas and electricity charges.

Mr. Goodlad: No announcements have yet been made about specific higher gas or electricity charges.

The Government are well aware that the engineering industry, and United Kingdom industry as a whole, is concerned to maintain and enhance its competitiveness. There has been no significant increase in electricity prices to industry since 1982, and the quarterly increases in contract renewal gas prices introduced by British Gas from April follow a two-year price freeze. The available evidence, including the last CBI survey of European industrial energy prices, suggests that in general United Kingdom electricity and gas prices to industry compare well with those elsewhere in Europe.

Reactor Safeguards

Mr. Benn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will invite the International Atomic Energy Agency to designate the prototype fast reactor for the application of International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad: Under the terms of the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement (Cmnd. 6730) the designation of facilities in the United Kingdom is a matter for the IAEA.

The prototype fast reactor and its associated reprocessing plant were designated by the IAEA for inspection over the period November 1980 to November 1982. The agency was responsible for the decision to terminate that designation. However, the facilities continue to be inspected by Euratom and to be subject to the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement and to the Euratom treaty. All material processed in them is accounted for to both the IAEA and Euratom.

Plutonium

Mr. Benn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if Her Majesty's Government support the proposed United States legislation (HR 5048, Sec 214) in regard to plutonium of United Kingdom civil origin exported to the United States under the provisions of the United States-United Kingdom Mutual Defence Agreement (Cmnd. 895, 1958) as amended.

Mr. Goodlad: We have had repeated assurances from the United States Government that it is not their policy to use plutonium exported from the United Kingdom under the Barter arrangements before 1971 for weapons purposes. The proposed legislation referred to by the right hon. Member is not a matter for Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Benn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the plutonium held at Sellafield on behalf of the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board is held under International Atomic Energy Authority safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad: Plutonium held at Sellafield on behalf of CEGB and SSEB is held in facilities which are included in the list of facilities provided to the IAEA under the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ceuta and Melilla

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if, in negotiations for the entry of Spain into the European Community, the Spanish Government have said that Ceuta and Melilla on the African coast are part of the kingdom of Spain;

(2) if the Commission of the European Communities regards Ceuta and Melilla as part of the kingdom of Spain.

Mr. Rifkind: None of the participants in the accession negotiations, including the Commission, has suggested that Ceuta and Melilla should not be discussed in the negotiations as part of the kingdom of Spain. Under Spanish law they are part of the kingdom of Spain. It is common ground that the terms of the Spanish accession treaty will apply to all parts of the kingdom of Spain.

Lisbon Agreement

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the discussions he has had with the Spanish Foreign Minister in Brussels on 27 November regarding the implementation of the Lisbon agreement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend on 28 November at column 927.

Gibraltar

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government of Gibraltar were fully consulted before his meeting with the Spanish Foreign Minister in Brussels on 27 November when the lifting of all restrictions against the Gibraltarian people by the Spanish Government was discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend on 28 November at column 927. As Sir Joshua Hassan has himself made clear, he was fully consulted at all stages.

Dr. Hassan Zafar Arif

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Pakistan concerning the detention of Dr. Hassan Zafir Arif, a former President of the Pakistan University Teachers Association.

Mr. Renton: None. We have no consular standing to intervene on behalf of Dr. Arif, who is a Pakistani national. However, we have recently taken steps to make known to the Pakistani authorities the concern felt in this country about certain aspects of the application of martial law in Pakistan.

Hong Kong

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to include in the proposed basic law all the provisions spelled out in annex 1 of the agreement for the transfer of sovereignty over Hong Kong to China.

Mr. Luce: Article 3(12) of the draft Joint Declaration of the British and Chinese Governments on the question of Hong Kong makes clear that the basic policies of the People's Republic of China regarding Hong Kong, as set out in the Joint Declaration and annex 1, will be stipulated in the basic law.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to secure an input from Hong Kong itself into the drafting of the proposed basic law in the context of the transfer of sovereignty over Hong Kong.

Mr. Luce: The drafting of the basic law is a matter for the Chinese Government. Chinese spokesmen have repeatedly made it clear, however, that the people of Hong Kong will be consulted about the content of the basic law.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to include within the proposed basic law for Hong Kong specific provisions for the interests of disabled people.

Mr. Luce: The draft agreement on the future of Hong Kong provides that the current social system in Hong Kong will remain unchanged. That system includes provision for the rehabilitation of the disabled as detailed in the Hong Kong Government's rehabilitation programme plan.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has in the context of the transfer of sovereignty over Hong Kong to China regarding the position of British subjects resident in Hong Kong.

Mr. Luce: The arrangements which will apply to the British Dependent Territories citizens resident in Hong Kong are set out in the United Kingdom memorandum associated with the draft joint declaration on the future of Hong Kong, which was published in a White Paper (Cmnd. 9352) on 26 September.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what provision has been made with the Chinese Government to preserve the value of the pensions payable in respect of service by officers of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong when the pension is payable outside Hong Kong after 1 July 1997;

(2) if it is intended to apply to members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong the terms similar to those of the public officers' agreements which were applied to members of the service in colonies which have achieved independence in the past 30 years;

(3) if, in the event of premature retirement from Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service resulting from the proposed constitutional changes in Hong Kong, officers will receive compensation from the Government of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if pensions derived from service after 30 June 1997 in Hong Kong by officers who were members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service will attract a supplementary pension for overseas service payable by the United Kingdom Government;

(5) if those serving officers in Hong Kong who are members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service will continue to be regarded by Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom after 30 June 1997 as members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service and as such eligible for consideration for transfer or promotion to any posts which he may be requested to fill;

(6) if, under the terms of the draft agreement with the Chinese Government, he is satisfied that the Hong Kong special administrative region Government after 30 June 1997 will not be able to withhold consent to any officers of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service accepting any offer of transfer or promotion within the service and will preserve his existing pension rights on transfer.

Mr. Luce: The draft agreement on the future of Hong Kong provides satisfactorily for continuity of service by serving officers in the public service in Hong Kong, on terms and conditions, including pay and pensions, no less favourable than before 1 July 1997. These provisions apply to members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service (HMOCS) serving in Hong Kong as well as to other civil servants.

The resumption of soverignty over Hong Kong by the People's Republic of China raises similar issues in respect of HMOCS as independence has in other dependent territories. It is not possible, however, to define now, 12½ years in advance of constitutional change, all the arrangements which will apply to members of HMOCS serving in Hong Kong and to the payment of their pensions by the Hong Kong special administrative region Government after 1 July 1997.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why no provision has been made in the draft agreement with the Chinese Government for the pensions of retired officers to be paid outside Hong Kong at the option of the pensioner after 1 July 1997 in the currency of another country.

Mr. Luce: Hong Kong pensions are paid in Hong Kong dollars by the Hong Kong Government. Section VII of annex 1 to the joint declaration provides that after 1 July 1997 the Hong Kong dollar shall continue to circulate and remain freely convertible and that no exchange control policy shall be applied in the Hong Kong SAR. Pensioners would therefore be free to have their pensions transferred outside Hong Kong in the currency of another country.

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to sign the law of the sea convention.

Mr. Rifkind: I have nothing to add to the reply which my right hon. and learned Friend gave on 9 of November to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) at column 41.

NATO (Nuclear Weapons)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation is seeking to achieve first strike capability with nuclear weapons.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.
No.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the organisation Friends of the Earth advocating banning aerial spraying of crops with pesticide; and what reply he has sent.

Mrs. Fenner: I have received no representations from Friends of the Earth advocating banning aerial spraying of crops. Friends of the Earth were consulted in the summer, prior to preparation of the Food and Environment Protection Bill, and indicated that they would be making detailed proposals for stricter controls over aerial spraying to the Ministry later. None has been received.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Jopling: Grants have been paid to the National Federation of Young Farmers Clubs and the National Proficiency Tests Council for a number of years and since 1983 to the Farming Wildlife Advisory Group. Payments in 1983-84 were:

National Federation of Young Farmers' Clubs	15,300
National Proficiency Tests Council	82,600
Farming and Wildlife Advisory Group	1,500

Butter (Storage Costs)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report the range of costs for storage per ton of butter over three monthly, six monthly and annual periods for the last convenient period for which figures are available.

Mr. Jopling: The publication of information in the form requested would be a breach of commercial confidence.

Animal Deaths (Falmouth)

Mr. Mudd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports have been made to officials of his Department about incidents of animal deaths in Mawnan Smith, Falmouth, Cornwall; if he will identify the number and types of animal involved; if he will indicate the nature of the presumed cause of death; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: A number of reports have been received by the Ministry's technical staff in the past year in relation to incidents of animal illness and death in the Mawnan Smith area. Some owners have reported deaths and illness in a number of dogs and cats. Tissue samples have been taken and carcase material examined but except for one case of a dog having died from organophosphorus poisoning the results have been either inconclusive or negative.

Milk

Mr. Spence asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by what percentage amount the average or national actual market price for milk has altered in each European Economic Community country including the United Kingdom for each of the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: EC member states do not generally administer national retail prices for milk nor are national average retail prices generally available. The table below shows percentage changes in retail prices. In most cases they are based on the month of January compared with the previous January. The figures relate to whole milk but are not all strictly comparable, because of variations in processing, packaging, method of sale and butterfat content. In some instances they include subsidies. No figures are available for Greece.

Changes in retail milk prices

	Percentage change in 1982 compared with 1981	Percentage change in 1983 compared with 1982	Percentage change in 1984 compared with 1983
Germany	+4·3	+5·0	−1·6
France	+16·5	+16·4	+8·5
Italy	+20·6	N/A	N/A
Netherlands	+6·9	+2·2	N/A
Belgium	+12·5	+10·2	−3·3
Luxembourg	+7·8	+15·7	+8·3
United Kingdom	+8·1	+5·0	No change
Irish Republic	No change	+13·3	+11·8
Denmark	+17·1	+10·3	−4·3

TRANSPORT

British Airways

31. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he plans any changes in the arrangements for privatising British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. It remains the Government's intention to sell the airline early in 1985 if possible.

41. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress towards the sale of British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: On 12 December last year my right hon. Friend announced to the House the Government's intention to proceed with the privatisation of British Airways as soon as possible. Subsequently the business of the British Airways board was on 1 April 1984 vested in British Airways plc. With assistance from our advisers and from the airline we are continuing with detailed preparations for a flotation early next year.

Greater London (Heavy Lorries)

32. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he proposes to take with regard to the Greater London council's proposed heavy lorry ban in inner London at nights and weekends.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the GLC has now postponed a decision in order to study the thousands of representations that have been made about their proposals, in particular from shops and businesses likely to be adversely affected. No doubt it is also considering whether to hold the public inquiry, for which so many of those making representations have pressed so that the issues can be fully and publicly explored before a final decision is taken.

Bus Services

33. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from local authorities covering rural areas about the implications of his White Paper on buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received about 250 representations from non-metropolitan counties and district councils on the White Paper and the consultation documents which my Department subsequently issued. The representations are varied in their content and are being taken into account in the drafting of proposals to lay before Parliament.

36. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many responses he has received to the White Paper, "Buses", Cmnd. 9300, and the related consultation papers; what percentage has been favourable and what percentage unfavourable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) earlier today.

39. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to introduce legislation to introduce competition into municipal bus operators.

Mr. Ridley: We will be bringing forward a Bill later this Session to allow competition in local bus services including services operated by municipal bus undertakings.

Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many replies he has received to his consultation document on the deregulation of bus services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received some 3,000 responses to the White Paper and the consultation documents which my Department issued subsequently. We are studying those representations as part of the preparation of the forthcoming Bill.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what provisions he will be making to assess regularity of bus services, increases in fare levels on rural routes, maintenance of safety standards and competitiveness of different bus companies in the event of deregulation.

Mr. David Mitchell: The transport and road research laboratory will be studying the developments following deregulation and the other changes envisaged in Cmnd. 9300, as it has other major developments including those that followed the Transport Act 1980. The licensing authorities will continue to be responsible for the maintenance of safety standards, and will have new powers of oversight over the quality of service provided by bus operators.

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Transport by how much he expects work loads to increase upon those regulating safety standards for buses following the implementation of his proposals in the White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. David Mitchell: I am determined that safety standards will be maintained and we are committed to providing the additional resources as necessary.

17. Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with safety standards in the trial areas for buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes. Experience in the trial areas has shown that safety standards in a competitive and deregulated environment can be maintained through the operator licensing system.

21. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek to ensure that the present level of concessions operating throughout the country will be retained if the proposals in the Government's White Paper on buses are implemented.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for individual local authorities to decide what provision to make for concessionary fares in their area. This would remain unchanged under the proposals in the White Paper, except that a local authority would be required to make available for all local bus services the concessions it provides.

24. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from Merseyside county council regarding his recent White Paper, "Buses", Cmnd. 9300.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received a copy of the county council's detailed report responding to the White Paper and the associated consultation papers.

Weighbridges (Commercial Vehicles)

34. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied that adequate weighbridge facilities are available to weigh any heavy commercial vehicles at any time of the day, every day of the week, at all ports of entry to the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: Axle weighbridges have been provided at most major roll-on/roll-off ferry ports and others are either under construction or planned. The Department's traffic examiners regularly check vehicles entering the country at these ports, and at other inland sites.

Inter-city trains (Advertising)

35. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of the British Railways Board, he will raise the matter of advertising on inter-city trains.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am always willing to discuss any matter the chairman wishes to raise at the regular meetings between us. But advertising is a matter for BR's commercial judgment. My hon. Friend may feel it helpful to draw his views on this matter to the attention of the chairman of BR, for his consideration.

Severn Bridge

37. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will be publishing the findings of the commissioner who conducted the inquiry into the proposal that tolls on the Severn bridge should be increased.

Mrs. Chalker: The inspector's report has now been received and is being considered. It will be published in the normal way when the decision is announced. I hope to do this as soon as possible.

Manchester Airport

38. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will seek to renegotiate the United States-United Kingdom air transport Bermuda agreement to include Manchester as a gateway for United States passenger-carrying airlines.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Mr. Montgomery) on 31 October 1984 at column 1111.

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the future of Ringway airport, Manchester.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A number of representations have been received from individuals and organisations in the north west region urging that increased use should be made of Manchester airport.

West Midlands (Northern Relief Route)

40. Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the proposed northern relief route for the west midlands.

Mrs. Chalker: Some 6,000 completed questionnaires have been received in response to the public consultation exercise. In addition about 300 written representations have been submitted together with responses from local authorities and other interested bodies. We are currently considering all these and hope to announce our decision in the new year.

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether plans exist to protect reinforcement shipping and aircraft against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulses.

Mr. David Mitchell: There are no specific plans to combat the effects of electromagnetic pulse on communications or other electrical equipment in ships and aircraft which may be required for reinforcement purposes. But advice on the phenomenon has been promulgated by the Ministry of Defence to shipowners and by the Civil Aviation Authority to airlines.

British Rail (Safety Standards)

Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with safety standards on British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: In his annual report on railway safety, published in November, the Department's chief inspecting officer points to certain areas where improvements must be sought, but his main conclusion is that the general level of safety has not fallen in any significant way below the excellent—indeed record—levels achieved in recent years.

M25

44. Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the most up-to-date estimates of the opening dates of the remaining sections of the M25 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: We expect to have the whole of the M25 open to traffic by the end of 1986.

The actual opening dates of the remaining sections will depend on the progress made by individual contractors, and these are in turn influenced by factors such as weather and ground conditions. The current formal contract completion dates for the sections still under construction are as follows:

M40—Maple Cross	28 January 1985
M40 interchange	14 April 1985
Leatherhead interchange	15 April 1985
M4—M40	7 July 1985

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what level of spending he predicts will be devoted to improving the road network system in the London area encircled by the M25 motorway during the next five years.

Mrs. Chalker: Proposals for schemes on trunk roads in London, were set out in Cmnd. 9059 "Policy for Roads in England: 1983."

I shall shortly be announcing the TSG settlement and capital approvals for schemes which the GLC and boroughs have put forward for support in 1985-86.

I cannot predict what further schemes may come forward, but I share the view expressed by the Select Committee on Transport that the GLC has done all too little to remedy the deficiencies of the road network on which the effective functioning and prosperity of London depends.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Ridley: Grants made by my Department to voluntary organisations are shown in the Supply Estimates 1984-85, copies of which are available in the Library.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Ridley: This information is not centrally available. The Department keeps a central record of the number of registered disabled people that it employs but not separately of the number registered blind.

Trunk Routes (Greater London)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport which specific trunk routes he will be administering in the Greater London area after the proposed abolition of the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 19 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) at column 47-48 and the associated map that has been placed in the Library.

Dartford Tunnel

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will move to establish appropriate means for providing for relieving future traffic congestion at the Dartford tunnel.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department is meeting the cost of providing additional toll booths at the tunnel and of widening the approach roads, all of which work, when completed, will enable the tunnel to handle the increase in traffic expected over the next few years. I am considering the longer-term implications for the tunnel in the more general context of expected growth rates of M25 and also of local traffic.

School Buses

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider legislation to prevent the overtaking by other traffic of school buses when passengers are boarding or alighting and to require drivers of such buses to display their hazard lights.

Mrs. Chalker: I am doubtful whether such legislation would be practicable or the best way forward. However, the safety of children travelling to and from school is of great importance and we keep this aspect of safety under close review. We are currently exploring ways in which buses used for school transport might be more easily identifiable.

The most reliable safeguard of all is to ensure that children follow sensible practice in crossing the road and that motorists for their part show extra vigilance at all times when children re about. We shall continue to take every opportunity of putting these messages across.

Channel Link

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on the Channel link.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Sims) on Thursday 22 November at column 280.

Crash Barriers

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stretches of dual carriageway, motorway and trunk road at present without a crash barrier between the carriageways and the dates such crash barriers are scheduled for installation.

Mrs. Chalker: The following stretches of motorway in England are without a safety fence between the carriageways:

M5 South of Bristol 8km
M6 Cumbria-Shap 14·5km
M10 St. Albans bypass 5km
M50 Ross Spur 35·5km

I am currently reviewing the traffic and accident records of these stretches to assess whether presence of a crash barrier would be of positive help on these lengths. I will write to my hon. Friend when I have reached a conclusion.

Similar information is not available for all-purpose dual carriageway trunk roads on which such safety fences are provided only as the need arises. There is no programme for the comprehensive provision of safety fences.

British Rail (Privatisation)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in the plans to privatise passenger services at present operated by British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received no proposals from BR for the private operation of rail passenger services.

Trunk Roads (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many sites on trunk roads with high accident rates have been recommended for remedial action by the Greater London council; on how many of those sites his Department has taken the appropriate action; and what is the estimated annual saving in personal injury accidents and financial costs to the community on those schemes which have been completed, and in relation to those schemes which have yet to be begun.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department has worked closely with the GLC for many years on the data provided by the police to identify accident black spots on London's trunk roads. To extract details of all sites identified through these contacts would be costly and difficult. The Department has taken or plans remedial action to reduce accidents wherever a serious problem exists.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport on how many sites on trunk roads in London his Department has initiated small scale accident remedial schemes; and what was the average cost of each scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department operates a rolling programme of special schemes of this sort in London involving 23 locations over the past three years at an average cost per scheme of £75,000.

Road Construction (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much he expects to spend on road construction in London up to the end of 1988.

Mrs. Chalker: Our proposed schemes for London, as elsewhere, are set out in "Policy for Roads in England: 1983" (Cmnd. 9059).

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what strengthening of his London divisions and regional offices have been carried out or are proposed to accommodate the increased use of reserve powers envisaged in the White Paper, "Streamlining the Cities", and his own consultation paper with London boroughs on the allocation of transport responsibilities in London;

(2) what estimate he has made of how many staff will be required in his Department to monitor and evaluate proposals from the London boroughs for the proposed strategic road network in London on which he will have reserve powers as proposed in his May 1984 consultation paper.

Mrs. Chalker: The role proposed for my Department is unlikely to have significant manpower implications, nor is it likely that extensive use of reserve powers will be necessary.

London Regional Transport

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what the proposed capital expenditure of London Regional Transport will be in 1985-86.

Mrs. Chalker: About £250 million, including the docklands light railway and internally funded property development.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what he estimates the rate cost to be for funding London Regional Transport's 1985-86 capital expenditure out of revenue;

(2) what amount of London Regional Transport capital expenditure in 1985-86 will be paid out of revenue and be a charge on the rates.

Mrs. Chalker: To the extent that LRT's capital investment could be funded from internally generated revenues, the requirement for grant, and hence the cost to ratepayers, would be reduced.

18. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what policy instructions he has given to London Regional Transport in respect of general employment policy.

Mrs. Chalker: None.

23. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give his reasons for making changes to the composition of the board of London Regional Transport.

Mrs. Chalker: The London Regional Transport Act made specific provision enabling my right hon. Friend to remove any member of the LRT board without giving reasons, within three months from the appointed day. Before exercising these powers, he invited the relevant members of the London transport executive to come to see him. These meetings confirmed the view that the professional management needed the support of a strong non-executive board which was not hostile to the policy embodied in the Act of removing from the GLC the control of this major transport undertaking.

Urban Traffic Control System, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the maintenance of the urban traffic control system in London is currently handled by the private sector.

Mrs. Chalker: As the GLC is currently responsible for the urban traffic control system in London, this information should be sought from it.

Parking (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy for the future provision and regulation of parking facilities in London.

Mrs. Chalker: The responsibilities for the provision and regulation of parking in London currently lies with the Greater London council and London borough councils.

Cyclists (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has in hand to establish a team to devise highway improvement and traffic management schemes to assist cyclists in furtherance of his policies following the proposed abolition of the Greater London council's cycling project team.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 19 and 23 November at columns 44 and 338.

M1 (Incident)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason all traffic was required to leave the northbound carriageway of the M1 motorway at junction 6 between 22.00 hours and 23.30 hours on Tuesday 27 November; why no prior warning to slow down was given to avoid danger; and why no traffic management had been employed to reduce congestion and inconvenience to road users.

Mrs. Chalker: The northbound carriageway was closed between junctions 6 and 7 from 20.00 hours on Tuesday 27 November until 06.00 hours on Wednesday 28 November to permit repairs to the carriageway and to central reserve drainage. There were advance warning signs from a point one mile south of junction 5 and a full traffic management system was in use from one mile south of junction 6 and along the diversionary route via the A405 to the M10.

Palace of Westminster (Helicopter Flights)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken by the Civil Aviation Authority to control flights of helicopters over the Palace of Westminster, especially those circling around for purposes of aerial photography; and what additional noise controls are imposed in hours of darkness.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Palace of Westminster is within the large area notified as the London control zone under rule 21 of the Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control Regulations 1981. Helicopters require prior permission to enter the zone from Heathrow air traffic control (ATC). Within the zone, helicopters must comply with special visual flight rules which include a requirement to follow the published helicopter routes, one of which follows the Thames alongside the Palace of Westminster. Departures from the special rules clearance for any purpose can be made only with the approval of Heathrow ATC.

There are very few helicopter movements in the zone during the hours of darkness. The main activity around the Palace of Westminster other than normal transit flights by day and night is aerial surveillance by helicopters of the Metropolitan police. Like any other flights in the control zone these must be authorised by air traffic control. No additional noise controls are required.

Midland Rail Line

19 Mr. Roger Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received advocating further electrification of the Midland rail line.

Mr. David Mitchell: In the last year I have received 10 representations in total from hon. Members, local authorities and members of the public arguing for the extension of electrification of the Midlands main line.

British Rail (Investment)

20 Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of the British Railways Board to discuss investment in British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: I frequently meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss matters of mutual interest.

30. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are his plans for further investment in British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for British Rail to decide its investment priorities and judge which proposals to bring forward. The Government will continue to support schemes which are worthwhile and soundly based.

Reserved Cabotage

22. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to persuade other European Economic Community member states to cease the practice of reserved cabotage.

Mr. David Mitchell: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the maritime sector.

I have urged the Commission to include measures to open up cabotage traffic among the proposals on shipping policy which it is expected to put before the Council of Ministers shortly.

London Regional Transport and British Rail

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made for the co-ordination of London Regional Transport and British Rail; and what is the date for the extension of travelcards from London Regional Transport to British Rail.

Mrs. Chalker: London Regional Transport and British Rail have a statutory duty under the London Regional Transport Act 1984 to co-operate with each other. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has set up the London Passenger Transport Group, in which he and I meet the two chairmen to agree initiatives affecting the common interests of the operators.

The new joint BR/LRT travelcard—to be known as the Capitalcard—will be available from 6 January next year. It will be in addition to, and not in place of, existing LRT travelcards.

Rail Services

26. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding the provision of rail services in passenger transport executive areas.

Mr. David Mitchell: In the last three months I have received a small number of specific inquiries from hon. Members and the public on the future of PTE supported services. I have also received some related comments during consultations on our proposals for abolishing the metropolitan county councils and for the introduction of competition to local bus services.

Transport Subsidies

27. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of local government budgets is accounted for by transport subsidies in the last financial year; and what is the estimate for the current financial year.

Mrs. Chalker: Expenditure on revenue support to public transport and concessionary fares by local authorities in England and Wales is estimated to comprise 3·5 per cent. of total budgeted current expenditure in 1883-84 and 3·6 per cent. in 1984-85.

Passenger Transport Executives

28. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect of the ending of section 20 grants on passenger transport executives and their successors.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier this afternoon to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards).

Euston-Birmingham (Rail Services)

29. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent proposals he has received from the British Railways Board for investment in rail services from Euston to Birmingham.

Mr. David Mitchell: None specifically. But we are currently considering a proposal for new electric locomotives for general use on west coast main line services.

SCOTLAND

Wheelchair Users

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he takes to seek to ensure adequate space for wheelchair users in auditoria, sports grounds and concert halls operated by public authorities in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The provision of a minimum number of wheelchair spaces in new public buildings, including halls, auditoria and sports stadia, is one of the requirements of the Building Standards (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1984 which were laid before Parliament by my right hon. Friend on 14 November to come into operation on 4 March 1985.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures to show hospital waiting lists in Dundee district for each of the past five years; and if he will also show the numbers treated from the lists in each year in each specialty.

Mr. John MacKay: Details of numbers on hospital waiting lists in the Dundee district as at 30 September in each of the last 5 years are as follows:

Specialty	1980	1981	*1982	1983	1984†

Island Authorities (Montgomery Report)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what views he has received since the publication of the Montgomery report regarding the problems of island authorities; and what policy he is formulating over its proposals.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has received a large number of responses to his invitation to interested parties to submit comments upon the report, including submissions from each of the islands councils. The committee's recommendations, and the views received on them, are now being considered, and we shall announce our conclusions as soon as possible.

Prison Population

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish information on current prison populations in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: Details of the prison population in 1983 were published on 27 November 1984 in the report "Prisons in Scotland" (Cmnd. 9400) and the accompanying statistical bulletin. On 20 November 1984 the total population in Scottish penal establishments was 4,976, made up as follows:

	Total	Male		Female
		Adult	Under 21	Adult	Under 21
Convicted	3,840	2,848	902	73	17
Convicted awaiting sentence	246	70	175	—	1
Untried	890	546	280	51	13
	4,976	3,464	1,357	124	31

Prison Building Programme

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how the current prison building programme in Scotland compares in scope with other recent programmes.

Mr. Younger: Expenditure on prison building has increased steadily from less than £1 million in 1978-79 to almost £10 million in the current year. The programme provides for substantial expenditure on phase II of Shotts prison, which is due to be completed early in 1987, and thereafter on the new maximum security prison to be built at Peterhead. Apart from major re-development at Greenock prison and Polmont young offenders' institution, the programme includes a broad spectrum of projects designed to increase security and improve accommodation and facilities for inmates and their visitors as well as working conditions and facilities for staff. This substantial programme highlights the priority which the Government attach to improving prison facilities in Scotland.

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the nature and purpose of the building work in progress at Perth and Saughton prisons.

Mr. Younger: The major building projects recently completed at Saughton prison and currently in progress at Perth prison are new gatehouse/administration blocks. Their purpose is to provide the requisite degree of security and control at the entry point to the prison, to provide more modern office accommodation and facilities for staff and to provide greatly improved accommodation and facilities for inmates' visitors, agents and social workers.

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements have been made for consultation on the requirements of the current prison building programme.

Mr. Younger: Detailed consultation is undertaken by my Department on the requirements for all projects at local level with governors and the local prison staff.

Criminal Statistics

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish criminal statistics for 1983.

Mr. Younger: As I said on 21 November in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), I propose to publish criminal statistics from 1983 onwards in statistical bulletins. The first bulletin for 1983, on recorded crime, should be published early in 1985, and others in the series during 1985.

Highlands and Islands (Regional Development Fund)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether all parts of Scotland covered by the Highlands and Islands Development Board will, following the implementation of the new regional aid proposals on assisted areas, continue to enjoy access to the European regional development fund.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has assurances from the European Commission that, notwithstanding the changes in the map of assisted areas in Scotland, the whole area within which the Highlands and Islands Development Board has responsibility for development will continue to be eligible for European regional development fund aid.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Yes. It is the board's scheme of assistance which gives the areas covered by it access to the European regional development fund; the scheme is not affected by changes in the new regional aid map on assisted areas.

Legal Aid

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of the criteria on legal aid brought to the notice of district courts.

Mr. Ancram: I have today placed in the Library a copy of Scottish Home and Health Department circular No. 2/1982, giving advice to district courts on legal aid.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases arising from the miners' strike have now been dealt with in (a) district and (b) magistrates' courts; and if he will specify the names of the courts.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available centrally. I am making inquiries and shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ards Borough District Council

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the revenue from present penny rates per pound net annual valuations in the Ards borough district council area; and what is the total estimated expenditure of the borough for 1984-85.

Dr. Boyson: The estimated product of a one penny rate is £53,800 for 1984-85; estimated expenditure is £3,462,900.

Newtownards Abbatoir

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current annual running cost of and revenue raised from Newtownards abbatoir.

Dr. Boyson: The 1984-85 general rates estimates for Ards borough council show the estimated running cost as £1,522,600, and estimated revenue as £1,160,000

Civil Service

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the proportion of Roman Catholics in the Northern Ireland Civil Service; and how this compares with the proportion in each of the last 10 years.

Dr. Boyson: In the report of an investigation into part of the non-industrial Northern Ireland Civil Service (published in December 1983) the Fair Employment Agency for Northern Ireland concluded that, in 1980, 30·7 per cent. of staff covered were Roman Catholics. Similar information is not available for other years.

The report recommended that an information system should be established which would indicate the religious balance within the Northern Ireland Civil Service. The Government accepted the recommendation and appropriate preparatory work has been undertaken.

Social Security

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the total expenditure, broken down by convenient district units, on social security in each of the past six years and in the current year:

(2) what percentage of total public expenditure broken down by convenient district units, in Northern Ireland has been spent on social security in each of the years 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

Financial year	Total expenditure on Social Security £ million	Social Security expenditure as a percentage of total public expenditure
1978-79	497	23·3
1979-80	589	24·1
1980-81	716	24·7
1981-82	868	27·0
1982-83	995	28·4
1983-84	*1,107	29·1
1984-85	*1,184	29·4

* Estimated figure.

Information on expenditure broken down by district or other units is not available.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the total numbers, by convenient district units, claiming each of the various benefits, supplements and allowances paid by the Department of Health and Social Services including the various additions and single payments under supplementary benefit, for the current year and each of the past six years.

Dr. Boyson: The information requested is extremely detailed, and I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the total numbers, by district, claiming housing benefit; and how many such claimants are totally dependent on social security.

Dr. Boyson: Information is not available on the number of recipients totally dependent on social security but the table shows the number who are in receipt of supplementary benefit.

District Council Area	Number of Persons in Receipt of Housing Benefit	Number of Housing Benefit Recipients also in Receipt of Supplementary Benefit
Antrim	4,700	3,000
Ards	6,500	3,700
Armagh	4,800	3,100
Ballymena	5,600	3,300
Ballymoney	2,800	1,700

Derry	12,300	8,600
Down	5,200	3,000
Dungannon	5,200	3,700
Fermanagh	6,000	4,000
Larne	3,200	2,000

District Council Area	Number of Persons in Receipt of Housing Benefit	Number of Housing Benefit Recipients also in Receipt of Supplementary Benefit
Limavady	3,000	2,100
Lisburn	9,500	6,000
Magherafelt	3,900	2,600
Moyle	1,900	1,300
Newtownabbey	8,400	4,900
Newry	10,700	7,100
North Down	6,300	3,000
Omagh	4,600	2,900
Strabane	5,000	3,600
TOTAL	187,200	118,500

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available, for the current year and each of the past six years, to indicate by convenient district units, the total number of households or individuals in Northern Ireland totally dependent on social security benefits and allowances.

Dr. Boyson: The information requested is not available.

Belfast City Hospital

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the precise expenditure to date on the new Belfast city hospital tower block, the budget allocation on an annual basis and the shortfall between the Department of Health and Social Services' allocation and the expenditure incurred by the Eastern health and social services board.

Dr. Boyson: The Department of Health and Social Services is directly responsible for the administration and capital funding of major works projects and a budget allocation is not therefore made to Health and Social Services Boards for this purpose. The capital expenditure incurred by the Department to date on the new Belfast city hospital tower block amounts to £54,797,449 including professional fees and expenses. In addition £2,195,521 has been spent on capital equipment for the new hospital.

From 29 February 1984 when the Belfast city hospital tower block was taken over from the contractors, the Eastern health and social services board assumed responsibility for meeting the running costs of the new building which at 30 September 1984 amounted to £632,494. Under present funding arrangements the Eastern board is responsible for meeting these running costs from within its annual allocation of funds.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of (a) the marketable wealth, excluding pension funds, (b) the total after tax incomes and (c) the total personal wealth, including occupational and state pension rights as personal assets, of Northern Ireland were owned or obtained by the richest 1 per cent., the richest 5 per cent., the richest 10 per cent., the richest 25 per cent. and the richest 50 per cent. of the population, respectively, in 1979 and 1982.

Dr. Boyson: The information, so far as it is available, is contained in "The Survey of Personal Incomes for 1979-80". Comparable information for 1981-82 will be available early next year.

DEFENCE

Conventional Forces (Europe)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what system of measurement is used by his Department to evaluate the relative strength of different national armies and the balance of conventional forces in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: To measure completely the relative strengths of different national armies it is necessary not only to take into account numbers of men and equipment, but also a wide range of other factors such as military strategy, geography, force structures, quality and age of equipment, logistic support, training, leadership and morale.

However, information on the numerical balance of conventional forces on the central front is contained in annex A of vol. I of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984".

Long Range Stand-Off Missile

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what public statements he made prior to 22 October on the long range stand-off missile.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1983" in the essay "New Technology, New Tactics"; and to the statement made by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in the debate on the Royal Air Force in February this year.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether a projection has been agreed for the number of cruise missiles to be procured under the long range stand off missile programme in (a) the memorandum of understanding with the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America and (b) the Northern Atlantic Treaty Organisation staff target for the long range stand-off missile.

Mr. Butler: Numbers of missiles are not stated in either document.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the anticipated minimum and maximum procurement figures for the long range stand-off missile for (a) the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and (b) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butler: It is too early in the procurement cycle for estimates of numbers of missiles to be made.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the ground-launched version of the long range stand-off missile will be considered for use by the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Butler: No requirement has been established for a ground-launched version of such a missile.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the projected initial operating capacity date for the long range stand-off missile.

Mr. Butler: No projected date can yet be given, but it is envisaged that, if a joint development and production programme follows on from the collaborative feasibility studies, this could result in a missile entering service in the early 1990s.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what year Britain will begin expenditure on research and development for the long range stand-off missile.

Mr. Butler: Some expenditure has already been incurred on the studies being carried out on a national basis, to which I referred in the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 20 November 1984, at column 83. Expenditure on the feasibility studies under the collaborative memorandum of understanding will begin in 1985-86.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation staff target for the long range stand-off missile includes options for either chemical or nuclear warheads or both;

(2) whether the memorandum of understanding between the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America explicitly precludes either a chemical or nuclear option for the long range stand-off missile.

Mr. Butler: The NATO staff target does not include options for chemical or nuclear warheads. Studies under the memorandum of understanding are explicitly related to assessing the feasibility of developing and producing a conventional weapon to meet the NATO staff target.

Porton Down (Poisoning Experiments)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many animals have been used in cyanide poisoning experiments at Porton Down; and if the animals were anaesthetised.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 22 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) at columns 570-72 in which I explained that the disclosure of detailed information about animal usage could in many cases be detrimental to national security. I am, therefore, unable to give the information requested in the first part of the question.

Experiments have been undertaken to improve understanding of the toxiology of cyanide poisoning and with a view to improving treament. Such experiments would not normally be conducted under anaesthesia as the use of anaesthetics would vitiate the purpose of the experiments.

All experiments involving the use of live animals at the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down, comply fully with the requirements of the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876, including the requirement to obtain a supplementary certificate for the performance of experiments without anaesthesia. If on any occasion an animal were found to be suffering severe pain which was likely to endure, it would at once be painlessly killed.

Noise (RAF Cottesmore)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is not in a position to announce proposals for compensation or assistance with double glazing or other forms of sound insulation for persons affected by noise from RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Lee: An announcement will be made shortly. Final details are being worked out, but I can confirm that grants will be available for secondary double glazing of a limited number of dwellings most affected by noise from RAF Cottesmore in accordance with my Department's normal policy.

Type 22 Frigates

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the reasons why he was unable to make a decision on the tenders for the two orders for the type 22 frigates before they lapsed, as stated in his reply of 27 November.

Mr. Lee: As I told my hon. Friend in the House on 24 July at columns 814-815, the tenders lapsed before the usual detailed examination of such factors as overheads and productivity had been completed. Further tenders were therefore sought and are now being examined.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the exact date of the destruction of the signals log of HMS Conqueror covering the period of the Falklands campaign.

Mr. Stanley: Destruction records are available only for classified signals, which were destroyed on various dates between 16 June 1982 and 16 February 1983.

Nuclear Weapons System (Procurement)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the procurement process relating to decisions about the procurement of a nuclear weapons system; and at what stage such decisions are considered by (a) the equipment policy committee and (b) the financial planning and management group of his Department.

Mr. Butler: The procurement process for nuclear weapons systems is essentially the same as that for conventional systems and was most recently described in a memorandum published with the second report of the Defence Committee, Session 1981-82, volume II. Cmnd. 9315 explains the changes to the procedures which are to be made from 2 January 1985 as part of the reorganisation of the Ministry of Defence.

Royal Ordnance Factories

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the Government have for the royal ordnance factories at Burghfield and Cardiff in the light of the imminent plans for privatisation of the royal ordnance factories in general; and if he will clarify who will be in control of the day-to-day running of these factories and the control of their security.

Mr. Butler: The royal ordnance factories at Burghfield and Cardiff are unaffected by plans to privatise the other ROFs. Day-to-day running of both ROF Burghfield and Cardiff, including responsibility for their physical security, will continue to rest with the director, atomic weapons factories.

Intercontinental Missiles

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Defence how quickly intercontinental ballistic missiles can be retargeted; and whether this process can be detected by surveillance aircraft.

Mr. Stanley: Generally speaking, modern ballistic missile systems can be retargeted in a matter of minutes. This process cannot be detected by aerial or any other surveillance system.

Falkland Islands (Local Allowance)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the detailed contents of the basket of items priced by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body in assessing whether a local allowance should be payable to service men stationed in the Falkland Islands; and how the costs are assessed in comparison with Belize;

(2) whether the cost of telephone calls to the United Kingdom from the Falkland Islands is included in the basket of costs assessed by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body in deciding whether to recommend payment of a local allowance.

Mr. Stanley: The assessment of a local overseas cost of living allowance does not fall within the terms of reference of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body but is a matter for the Ministry of Defence in consultation with Her Majesty's Treasury.

The following individual elements are used in calculating local overseas allowances:

Food at home
Food in mess
Clothing
Cigarettes
Confectionery
Household cleaning materials
Toiletries
Laundry
Dry cleaning
Hairdressing
Car
Public transport
Stationery
Postage
Telephones
Toys
Newspapers and Magazines
Television
Records and Tapes
Home Entertainment
Meals out Dances
Drinks at home
Drinks out
Drinks in mess
Cinema and Spectator Sport
Babysitting
Sport
Holidays
Mess subscriptions
Mess functions

The same system is used in all countries outside the United Kingdom where members of the Armed Forces are stationed.

Joint Radar Project

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the status and purpose of the joint radar project with the United States of America known as Cold Witness;

(2) what is the status of the joint programme with the United States of America to install an over-the-horizon radar in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will be answering shortly.

Ground-launched Anti-ship System

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any consultations between the British and American Governments on the question of the ground-launched anti-ship system since January.

Mr. Stanley: I will write to the right hon. Gentleman.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of (a) fatal, (b) major and (c) minor accidents on the youth training scheme for the period from 1 July to 30 September, showing the average number of persons in training in each month during that period and the total number of entrants to the scheme for those three months.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is tabled below.

1 July to 30 September 1984

	Youth Training Scheme
Number of entrants (a)	190,013
Average number in training (a) per month	295,226
Number of fatalities (b)	3
Number of injuries (c):
Major	50
Minor	370
Total number of injuries	423

(a) These figures are provisional and will be subject to change as further information becomes available.

(b) This figure includes two road traffic accidents.

(c) MSC accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the figures quoted in the above table will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the HSE had the individuals been employed.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the level of allowance which would be paid to young people on the youth training scheme, for each year since 1982, if that allowance had been increased since 1982, by (a) the rise in prices and (b) the rise in average earnings.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The allowance paid to trainees was set at £25 per week in January 1982. If the allowance had been increased in January 1983 and January 1984 in line with either the movement in the general index of retail prices or the average earnings index, the revised rates would have been as follows:

	In line with retail prices index	In line with average earnings index (whole economy, seasonally adjusted)
January 1983	26·23	27·20
January 1984	27·58	29·12

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many places under the youth training scheme for the year 1984-85 have been approved with the company Rank Xerox.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of November, 93 mode A places had been approved under the youth training scheme at Rank Xerox UK and 48 mode A places at Rank Xerox International. A further 26 mode A places had been approved at Rank Xerox Engineering and this company also has 20 approved places under mode B1.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young women are entering women-only training courses within the youth training scheme in 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: To date two training projects under the youth training scheme have been designated under section 47 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 permitting training for young women only. Of the 46 places being offered in 1984-85 on these schemes, 25 are currently occupied.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the sum of £78 paid by the Manpower Services Commission to the parents of George McCormack, killed on a youth training scheme in West Lothian on 27 July, was calculated; whether he has any intention of increasing the amount awarded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 November 1984, c. 539-40]: The payment by the Manpower Services Commission to the parents of George McCormack was exactly the same as would have been made by the Department of Health and Social Security, under section 71 of the Social Security Act 1975, had he been an employee.

Skillcentre Places

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the number of skillcentre places available per 100,000 work force in Yorkshire and Humberside and West Yorkshire, respectively; and how these figures compare with those for each English region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: For each 100,000 of the work force in September 1984 it is estimated the following skillcentre places were available:

	Number
Yorkshire and Humberside	46
—of which, West Yorkshire	57
Northern region	83
North-West	54
Midlands	42
South-East	39

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will make a statement on the timing and location of skillcentre closures, skillcentre annex closures and skillcentre staff redundancies necessary to meet the targets of the skillcentre business plan and on the position in each Manpower Services Commission region;

(2) if he will make a statement on his plans to develop the skillcentre network in Britain and, in particular, in London.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's statement to the House on 29 November at column 1108.

Rates of Pay

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action has been taken by his Department and by the Manpower Services Commission following last year's report, a copy of which has been sent to him, by west midlands low pay unit about rates of pay below the legal minimum set by wages councils being advertised in jobcentres in the area.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Instructions issued to jobcentres make it clear that vacancies should not be displayed where it appears that a wages order is likely to be violated and that jobcentre staff should notify the wages inspectorate of any vacancies which offered wages at below the wages council minima.

To reinforce these instructions revised guidance was issued in the early part of this year. In addition, in order to help jobcentre staff identify vacancies where the wage offered falls below the legal minimum, they receive regularly updated information on the minimum rates applying to the majority of workers in the main wages council trades.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many grants have been made through the enterprise allowance scheme in the borough of Kettering since the scheme's creation, expressed both as an absolute number and as a proportion of the total grants made in Northamptonshire.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret the figures are not available in the form requested. However by 27 November 1984, 482 people in the Northamptonshire area had joined the enterprise allowance scheme since its introduction on 1 August 1983.

Jobcentres

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the Manpower Services Commission has any plans to open a jobcentre at Westbury.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. Detailed consideration was given to the feasibility of opening a small jobcentre at Westbury during the recent preparation of proposals for the development of the jobcentre network in the Manpower Services Commission's south-west region but I understand this was found not to be a cost-effective proposition in the light of the services already available through other jobcentres in the area.

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether any staff cutbacks are planned at the Warminster, Trowbridge and Melksham jobcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The employment manager for the south-west region of the Manpower Services Commission has prepared revised proposals for the development of the jobcentre network in his region, following widespread consultation with interested parties. Copies of these proposals, including details of Warminster, Trowbridge and Melksham jobcentres were sent to my hon. Friend on 9 November. They provide for a small reduction in the overall number of staff employed in the three jobcentres over the next three years. No changes are proposed in the services provided at each of the three jobcentres, and the staff savings will result from the introduction of more effective methods of working including the introduction of a more efficient computerised system for handling employers' vacancies.

The Manpower Services Commission hopes to reach final decisions on these proposals shortly.

Community Programme Places

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment what allocation of community programme places has been afforded to Barnsley in the last 12 months, specifying the numbers that have also been allocated to Barnsley district trades council.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Places on the community programme are allocated to the Wakefield area, which comprises Wakefield, Barnsley and Doncaster. The number of filled places over the past 12 months has varied but has been higher than is strictly warranted by its incidence of long-term unemployment. The current allocation is 2,650. Of these, approximately one-quarter are allocated to projects in the Barnsley local authority area. The project run by Barnsley district trades council has 22 places.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions are taking place between his Department and the Manpower Services Commission to increase community programme places, especially in the Barnsley area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend set out our current plans for the development of the community programme in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 30 July at columns 121-122. We have previously guaranteed its future until at least October 1986.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment why the Manpower Services Commission is refusing applications from trade councils for an increased share of community programme places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission area manpower boards consider all proposals to fund community programme projects in the light of guidance about the priorities for selection, the number of places available in each area and the needs of local long term unemployed people. No distinction is made between applications from trades councils and those from other organisations.

Industrial Training Boards

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the rubber and plastics processing industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The training arrangements that replaced the rubber and plastics processing industry training board are now undertaken mainly by the plastics processing industry training board and the British rubber industry training organisation.

The British rubber industry training organisation was established by the British Rubber Manufacturers Association. It is concentrating its training efforts in management and supervisory training.

Both the board and the training organisation distribute grants from the Manpower Services Commission to employers in the industry. Good progress is being made towards the objectives of the new training initiative.

The board has just produced its first Open Tech module, "an Introduction to Polymer Materials", and is developing standards of performance and training recommendations for the industry, in addition to managing a 500 place youth training scheme. The British rubber industry training organisation is co-operating with the board in the production of Open Tech materials for the rubber industry and is heavily involved in the assessment of the potential of individuals and their training needs through its assessment centre programme. It is also actively involved in providing information on the youth training scheme in which all the major companies are participating as managing agents. Both organisations are co-operating with the engineering industry training board's work in the development of segmental apprentice training.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the footwear, leather and fur skin industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Responsibility for training in those sectors previously covered by the footwear, leather and fur skin industry training board now rests principally with two non-statutory training organisations, the British Leather Confederation and the British Footwear Manufacturers Federation. The Manpower Services Commission maintains close links with both.

In the smaller sectors previously covered by the board, training needs are identified and met mainly by individual employers with some assistance from their employer associations and chambers of trade and commerce.

The British Leather Confederation has worked closely with the Leather Producers Association to develop a national model for the youth training scheme and is hopeful of carrying forward a five year plan for the industry which would include the other objectives of the new training initiative.

In footwear repair and manufacture, individual firms in various localities have provided places under the youth training scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the paper and products industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Responsibility for training in that sector of industry previously covered by the paper and paper products industry training board now rests principally with two non-statutory training organisations, the British Paper and Board Industry Federation Education and Training Council and the British Fibreboard Packaging Employers' Association.

Good progress is being made in the sector towards the objectives of the new training initiative. For example, the British Paper and Board Industry Federation Education and Training Council has recently signed an agreement with the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union to replace the traditional time-served apprenticeship with one that is standards-based.

Many companies throughout the sector have played an important part in the youth training scheme. Both of the principal training organisations have offered guidance to employers in the area, acting as sponsors or managing agents.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the planned date of publication of the detailed research which has been commissioned by the Manpower Services Commission on training arrangements in sectors where statutory industrial training boards have been abolished.

Mr. Peter Morrison The Manpower Services Commission has not commissioned any detailed research on training arrangements in sectors where statutory industrial training boards have been abolished.

In December 1982, the commission invited the British Association for Commercial and Industrial Education to report on training information systems, with particular reference to non-statutory training organisations. I am not aware of any plans for publishing this report.

Women-only Courses

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number and location of women-only work preparation courses funded by the Manpower Services Commission in each year from 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of women-only work preparation courses by region for each year 1979-80 to 1984-85 is as follows

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Scotland	1	4	7	6	2	3
Northern	2	5	6	7	7	9
Yorkshire & Humberside	1	1	4	5	8	4
North-West	0	2	3	3	6	2
Midlands	5	3	2	4	8	7
Wales	6	4	5	8	5	6
South-West	0	3	3	3	7	9
South-East	3	3	3	4	3	5
London	3	4	7	5	6	13
Totals	21	29	40	45	52	58

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number and location of women-only vocational training courses funded by the Manpower Services Commission in each year from 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: During the period 1979-80 to 1984-85, the Manpower Services Commission has not funded any women-only vocational training courses under the training opportunities scheme, although women-only work preparation courses leading to full skills courses have been supported.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was, in each Manpower Services Commission region, the level of expenditure by Manpower Services Commission on women-only training courses in each year from 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Expenditure for the first six months of the 1984-85 financial year on women-only courses supported under our training opportunities scheme was as follows:

Region	£ Expenditure
Scotland	9,500
Northern	8,400
Yorkshire and Humberside	54,900
North-West	77,700
Midlands	64,500
Wales	45,300
South-West	102,000
South-East	43,800
Total	447,000

Total expenditure under the scheme for women-only training in 1984-85 is expected to be £1·25 million. Comparable figures are not available for earlier years. In addition, we are spending around £1·16 million in support of nationally organised forms of women-only training provision for which regional figures are not available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement, for each Manpower Services Commission region, on planned expenditure and course capacity, for women-only courses which is envisaged in the current Manpower Services Commission corporate plan.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Plans for the 1985-86 financial year and beyond have not yet been finalised but it is anticipated that total provision for women-only training next year will be at broadly the same level as in 1984-85, around £2·4 million.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the policy of the Manpower Services Commission to local authority initiatives in funding women-only training courses.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Decisions taken by local authorities on particular training which they wish to support are not a matter for the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the number of entrants to women-only training and work preparation courses in London in each year from 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of women entering women-only work preparation courses in the London region for each year from 1979-80 is as follows:

Year	Number
1979-80	40
1980-81	48
1981-82	72
1982-83	84
1984-85	*170

* Planned.

Adult Training

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on progress towards recognised standards of competence in adult training in line with the objectives of the new training initiative and on the role of the skillcentre training agency in this.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Apprenticeship Statistics

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of recruitment to the first year of engineering, craft and technician apprenticeship, by region, in each year from 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The following figures show registrations made by the engineering industry training board of first year engineering craft and technician apprentices:

Region	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85 to date*

Number of non-scope company trainees registered‡	3,465	2,976	2,428	1,956	2,237	1,051

* Shows registrations made to date in the 1984-85 training year. Registrations are received from employers throughout the year. The Engineering Industry Training Board's national recruitment target for apprentice trainees in 1984-85 is 8,650.

† Estimated.

‡The engineering industry training board acts as a registering body for some training to comparable standards carried out in industries other than engineering. The national totals for these registrations are shown and are excluded from the main totals.

The number entering traditional apprenticeships will increasingly fail to reflect the extent of skill training being undertaken in industry, due to the reform of existing training arrangements and public funding of first-year training under the youth training scheme.

Training

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his plans for the future of employer-based group training associations and training centres and the role planned for them in the new training initiatives.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government stated in their White Paper, "Training for Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135), that the primary responsibility for training must rest with employers, who can best ensure that training of the right quantity, quality and cost takes place. It is consistent with this policy that all industry training organisations, including industrial training boards, voluntary training organisations and group training associations, should meet their own operating costs.

The Manpower Services Commission has therefore decided that, where funding has been available in the past to support the operating costs of some employer-based group training associations and training centres, this should now be phased out over a period not exceeding three years from April 1984. This will allow such associations time to establish an independent financial basis for their operations. However, while support for operating costs will end, the associations will continue to be able to apply for funding available under the commission's various training programmes on the same basis as other industry training organisations.

The Government believe that group training associations can continue to have an important role to play in training and a number of them are becoming directly involved in helping to meet the objectives of the new training initiative, for example as managing agents under the youth training scheme and in the reform of skills training and the opening up of training opportunities for adults.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many group training association training centres in each industrial sector have closed down since 1979;

(2) what information he has as to how many employer-based group training associations have ceased to operate in each industry since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This information can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of expenditure by industry on industrial training in the carpet industry, the ceramic, glass and mineral products industry, the chemical and allied products industry, the clothing and allied products industry, the cotton and allied textiles industry, the distributive industry, the food, drink and tobacco industry, the footwear, leather and fur skin industry, the furniture and timber industry, the hotel and catering industry, the iron and steel industry, the knitting, lace and net industry, the man-made fibres industry, the paper and paper products industry, the printing and publishing industry, the rubber and plastics processing industry, the shipbuilding industry and the wool, jute and flax industry, respectively, in 1979-80; and what the figure for such expenditure is likely to be in 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information on total expenditure on training in these industries is not available.

Disabled Persons (Training)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether, during the next 12 months, the Government propose to take any special measures to provide disabled people, for whom education in schools and colleges is inappropriate, with suitable training leading to work in the information technology industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government have well-established arrangements to facilitate access to training for disabled people, including training leading to work in the information technology field. The normal rules governing support for training run by the Manpower Services Commission are relaxed for disabled people. Disabled people who cannot attend information technology courses at colleges may be able to take advantage of the training provided by the network of information technology centres, including a special course at Reading information technology centre, training arranged with suitable employers, or at the four residential training centres for disabled people supported by the commission.

Occupational Cancer

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Employment if steps are taken to ensure that Her Majesty's inspectors of health and safety are aware of the trade names of dyes and colours in use in industry in Britain which have the known potential to cause cancer of the bladder in workers using such dyes and colours; and what is the total number and the chemical types of such dyes and colours.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Executive is not aware of any dyes or colours in use in industry in Britain that have a known proven potential to cause cancer of the bladder in workers using them, though suspicions have arisen from time to time about particular groups of dyes or individual dyes and it has not been possible positively to disprove the existence of a risk of bladder cancer among exposed workers.

In particular, suspicion has fallen on dyes produced from benzidine. In the past, these may have contained some free benzidine as an impurity, but the concentrations of this substance have now been reduced to very low levels. Following discussions by the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on toxic substances, the Health and Safety Executive issued a guidance note in 1982, "Benzidine-based Dyes — Health and Safety Precautions".

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made towards ratification of the International Labour Conference occupational cancer convention, 1974 (No. 139), for the control of all cancer-causing substances at work; and what information he has as to which member states have already ratified the convention; and in which year this was accomplished in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In January 1984, following the consideration by the Health and Safety Commissioner's advisory committee on toxic substances of draft regulations together with a general approved code of practice and a supplementary code of practice produced by a working party on the control of carcinogens, ACTS recommended to the HSC that a draft consultative document should be published for comment. The consultative document was published for comment. The consultative document was published in August and the consultation period ends on 1 March, 1985.

Following the consultation period, I expect that some further work will be needed before the regulations can be put by the HSC to the Government for approval; once the new regulations have been approved I hope that the Government will be in a position to ratify IL convention No. 139.

The information about ratifications of the convention is shown in the table.

ENVIRONMENT

New Homes (London)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his assessment, based on the generalised needs index, of the requirement for the building of new homes in London over the next 10 years and of the number of renovations required over the same period.

Sir George Young: The generalised needs index is used to determine the financial allocation for London. It is for individual London authorities to determine how much to spend on new build and renovation, in the light of their assessment of local need.

International Youth Year

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution his Department intends to make towards International Youth Year.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My Department's main locus in international youth year lies in my responsibilities for sport and the Sports Council. In January, the council is launching a £½ million campaign designed to coincide with international youth year and called "Ever Thought of Sport?" to increase participation in sport amongst the 13 to 24 years age group.

Asbestos

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to ban the use of asbestos in the construction or improvement of buildings partly or wholly financed by Government or local authority grants.

Sir George Young: Draft regulations have been published to prohibit all use of crocidolite or amosite (blue and brown asbestos), sprayed asbestos and the use of asbestos in thermal and acoustic insulation. The use of chrysotile (white) asbestos is declining, but there are some remaining uses in building materials where alternatives are not yet in general use and where the risk of release of asbestos fibres in normal use is negligible. There are no plans to ban the use of the remaining asbestos materials in the construction or improvement of buildings financed by grant.

Inner London Education Authority

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what costs he estimates will be incurred arising from the removal of the Inner London education authority from county hall after the proposed abolition of the Greater London council in 1986.

Sir George Young: There is no reason to think that there will be any immediate disturbance of ILEA staff when ownership of county hall passes to the residuary body.

Jubilee Park, Southall

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is considering ordering a public inquiry into the London borough of Ealing's decision to build four-bedroomed houses across the entrance to Jubilee park, Southall.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. Ealing borough council, as local planning authority, has now deemed itself planning permission for the proposed development. My right hon. Friend would not therefore be justified in intervening in what is essentially a matter for local decision.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This information is not centrally available. The Department keeps a central record of the number of registered disabled people that it employs but not separately of the number registered blind.

Local Authority Staff

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of full-time or full-time equivalent employees of local authorities in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:—

Employees of local authorities in England (Full-Time Equivalents as at June each year)

	Number
1979	1,975,156
1980	1,951,008
1981	1,923,623
1982	1,890,955
1983	1,889,663
1984	1,892,719

Improvement Areas (London)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many statutory improvement areas are currently managed and funded by the Greater London council; and how many dwellings they encompass.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 30 October to the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) at column 934, in reply to his identical question.

Greater London Council

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions his Department has sought information from the Greater London council regarding the abolition of the council; and how many times such requests for information have been met with refusal since Royal Assent of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Sir George Young: We have sought information, under section 5 of the Act, on staffing matters and 1985-86 expenditure. On countless occasions, the Department has sought information about specific applications for consent under sections 7 to 9 where the data supplied by the GLC have been inadequate. In one case we have declined to take any further action towards reaching a decision on whether a consent could be given because, despite repeated requests, sufficient supporting information has not been provided.

Maltby Common

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the deeds he saw from Messrs Allen and Overy, solicitors in relation to Maltby common, were a deed of title to the specific ownership of Maltby far and low common.

Mr. Macfarlane: There was more than one deed and other documentation, examination of which satisfied my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the title to Maltby commons could be traced to the Earl of Scarborough.

Enveloping Schemes

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if local authorities are required to produce photographs to his Department in advance of enveloping schemes.

Sir George Young: No. However paragraph 3 of DOE circular 26/84 says that photographs showing the main house types and the general condition of properties in proposed enveloping schemes are helpful and may be included in support of submissions.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effects on the economies of scale of enveloping arising from his circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping".

Sir George Young: The economies of scale achieved by enveloping schemes put forward by local authorities and approved under circular 26/84 will depend on their size and nature.

Although the circular allows some flexibility in the size of schemes, it discourages those that are too small, and I would expect economies of scale to be greater than previously.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by what means he anticipates local authorities will have regard to the social and financial circumstances of owners of property in respect of enveloping schemes as set out in paragraph 12 of circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping".

Sir George Young: All enveloping schemes fall within housing action areas. In considering enveloping schemes, local authorities should draw on the assessment of social conditions that they are obliged to have made before declaring the HAA, and on the results of subsequent monitoring.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is meant by the term area as a whole in paragraph 7 of circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping".

Sir George Young: Paragraph 7 reminds authorities that the impact of enveloping schemes will have an effect on property values greater than that brought by isolated improvements to individual dwellings. The area affected will depend on the circumstances but will normally extend beyond the enveloping scheme to the surrounding housing action area.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the extra manpower requirements of his regional offices in monitoring enveloping schemes under circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping".

Sir George Young: None.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his evidence that the operation of circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping", will increase the speed of decision making on enveloping schemes.

Sir George Young: The circular, in giving clearer guidelines to local authorities, will eliminate the need for protracted discussion and appraisal which has hitherto been necessary following submission of projects. Where cases fall within the prescribed criteria, decisions will be given within 30 days of acknowledgement of receipt of the completed submission within the Department, unless the authority hears to the contrary.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the new requirements for enveloping set out in circular 26/84, "The Improvement of Older Housing: Enveloping", are to be met without increasing manpower while maintaining the same rate of properties being enveloped.

Sir George Young: Though there may be additional work involved in providing the project information required at the outset this should be readily available to local authorities. I would expect any extra effort normally to lead to offsetting savings by removing the need for local authorities to respond to requests for further information once a project is submitted for approval.

Housing (Brighton)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has received any representations regarding an increase in Brighton council's housing subsidies;

(2) what information he has on the level of council rents and housing subsidies in Brighton.

Sir George Young: Based on information received from the local authority, the average council rent in Brighton is £17·82 per week.

Representations have been received from the council's labour group seeking financial help through the subsidy system. The council has had no entitlement to housing subsidy since 1981-82. The present system of housing subsidies, introduced by the Housing Act 1980, is designed to channel aid to those authorities most in need of support, having regard to their local needs and resources. Where an authority has no entitlement to housing subsidy, it can reasonably be expected to meet its housing needs from its own local resources. It is for the council to decide how this should be done.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the matters discussed at the meeting on November, between his Department and members of Brighton borough council.

Mr. Waldegrave: I saw a deputation of elected members of Brighton borough council on 21 November to hear their representations about the council's rate support grant position.

Rents

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list each borough, district council and new town still in receipt of housing subsidy to their housing revenue account; and if he will list the average rent for those authorities and indicate which of those authorities fall within the current criteria for high rent status;

(2) if he will list and rank the latest information on the average rent for each housing authority and new town in England and Wales.

Sir George Young: Information on the average rents of local authorities and new towns is included in the chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication Housing Rents Statistics at April 1983". Statistics for April 1984 will, I understand, be published by CIPFA before the end of the month.

A list of authorities which have claimed an entitlement to main housing subsidy is attached. Those whose reported rents are above the qualifying threshold for high rent status are indicated.

Rate Support Grant (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if rate support grant to individual boroughs will be increased if the Greater London council were to be abolished, to reflect, pound for pound, current Greater London council obligatory revenue contributing towards deficits on the transferred housing stock.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have announced our intention that the broad financial effect of the payments the GLC is obliged to make should be preserved after abolition, preferably through the rate support grant system. Local governmentwill be consulted about the detailed arrangements.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing authorities have had their notional surplus on the housing revenue account for 1984-85 increased a zero grant-related expenditure; and if he will give an analysis as follows (a) the percentage of shire districts receiving this increase, (b) the percentage of metropolitan districts receiving this increase, (c) the percentage of London authorities receiving this increase and (d) for all housing authorities and each class of housing authority, the housing revenue account grant related expenditures before and after the notional surpluses were set at zero and their actual budgeted 1984-85 surpluses/deficits.

Sir George Young: For 1984-85, 317 housing authorities have their notional surpluses on the housing revenue account set to zero for GRE purposes. This comprised 94·6 per cent. of shire districts, 77·8 per cent. of metropolitan districts and 45·0 per cent. of outer London boroughs.

Housing revenue account GRE's with and without notional surpluses set to zero are shown in annex A, for classes of authority, and in table 1 for all individual housing authorities. Actual budgeted 1984-85 surpluses and deficits are shown in table 2. I have placed copies of these figures in the Library of the House.

Planning Permissions

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research is now in progress in his Department concerning the take-up of planning permissions; whether this research fulfils the commitment made in the interview of 13 September 1983 to the journal Building Design; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Department is reviewing the take-up of office planning permissions in accordance with the commitment given in the Building Design interview. The need for any additional research is being considered.

Housing Association Schemes (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the total cost of repair work needed on housing association schemes in London originally funded by the Greater London council.

Sir. George Young: No.

Housing (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who would honour Greater London council warranties in respect of purchasers of ex-Greater London council dwellings after the London residuary body has been wound up in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Sir George Young: This is one of the residual matters for which the London residuary body will be charged with devising appropriate arrangements under clause 63 of the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who would pay any rate-borne costs if a borough decided to build homes for elderly people outside London, in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Sir George Young: The borough council would allocate tenancies, manage the property and, if it wished, bear some costs on the rates wherever the homes are situated.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those London boroughs which have exercised their powers to develop homes outside London; how many homes have been built; and how many were specifically designed for the elderly.

Sir George Young: This information could be obtained from Departmental records only at disproportionate cost. However, according to table 2.1 of "Greater London Housing Statistics 1983", published by the Greater London Council, in March 1983 the following London borough councils owned residential stock outside London:

Borough	Number of dwellings
Ealing	17
Enfield	1,069
Haringey	822
Hillingdon	95
Kingston	4
Lambeth	113
Merton	381
Newham	1,087
Sutton	128
Wandsworth	2
Waltham Forest	722
Total	4,440

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the boroughs listed in the answer to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 13 June, Official Report, column 493, as having commented favourably on the specific proposal that the London boroughs would take over full responsibility for the Greater London council's housing role in the event of the Greater London council being abolished, did not fully support that proposal.

Sir George Young: All those boroughs listed in the first part of my answer to the hon. Member of 13 June at column 493 fully supported the proposal that London boroughs should take full responsibility for the Greater London council's housing role; their comments on points of details did not affect this overall view.

Local Authorities (Expenditure Targets)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in setting the provisional expenditure targets for 1985-86, he had regard to the increase in target over that set for each local authority in 1984-85 and the individual circumstances of each local authority.

Mr. Waldegrave: The provisional targets for 1985-86 were framed by reference to principles applicable to all local authorities. The principles used were described in the material placed in the Library on 24 July.

"Streamlining the Cities"

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if table 4 (Housing) of part II of the report on the consultation on "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd. 9063) includes the responses both of the Association of Metropolitan authorities and the Association of London Authorities.

Sir George Young: Yes.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which authority received the highest housing investment programme allocation in England for 1984-85; and what was the amount of the allocation.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to his earlier question on 26 October at column 749.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the unsatisfactory dwellings which in 1984-85 constituted 59 per cent. of the general needs index used to distribute housing investment programme allocations were owned by local authorities; and what proportion of the total general needs index is made up of unsatisfactory local authority dwellings.

Sir George Young: Some 13 per cent. of the total dwelling stock found to be unfit, lacking basic amenities or in disrepair, and therefore included within the stock condition indicators of the generalised needs index, was owned by local authorities. Unsatisfactory local authority-owned dwellings accounted for 8 per cent. of the total generalised needs index used for 1984-85 housing investment programme allocations.

Hares (Mortality)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what investigations are being made into the current high mortality rate in the hare population of southern England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The current decline in the hare population follows a higher than average summer breeding rate and is believed to be largely attributable to natural causes. The position is being carefully monitored by the Nature Conservancy Council and by the wildlife incident investigation service of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The Nature Conservancy Council will be investigating the status of the species as part of the quinquennial review of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and will be considering whether the hare needs special protection.

Water Charges

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about proposed increases in water rates; if he will review the borrowing powers of water authorities in order to effect a stabilisation of water rate levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Some 80 representations, including five questions have been received from hon. Members and others concerning increases in water services charges next year. As my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 12 November 1984 in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) at columns 67-69, the external finance limit for water authorities in England and Wales for 1985-86 will be £203 million. There are no plans to change this.

Acid Rain

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response the Government are making to the current concern regarding acid rain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 13 November 1984, c. 183]: The Government have today published their reply to the report on acid rain by the Select Committee on the Environment in the form of a Command Paper; copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the capital expenditure of local authorities in London for each major service for each of the years 1978-79 to 1982-83.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 29 November 1984, c. 560]:

Following is the information based on outturn returns from local authorities:

Gross Capital Expenditure: Local Authorities in London†*

£ million

	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83
Education, Libraries Museums and Art Galleries	53	55	73	54	61
Health and Social Services	16	20	24	19	20
Local Roads and Transport	98	138	174	188	211
Housing	789	902	848	635	741
Other Local Services	142	187	233	222	273

* All capital expenditure charged to capital accounts and amounts of capital expenditure charged direct to revenue or other funds and not capitalised.
† Greater London Council (including ILEA), City of London, and London Boroughs.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the reduction, measured in 1984-85 prices, has been in the level of local authority capital expenditure in London and the rest of England, respectively, between the years 1978-79 and 1982-83.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 29 November 1984, c. 560]: Local authority gross capital expenditure in London and the rest of England fell by 27 per cent. and 14 per cent. respectively in cost terms (at 1984-85 prices) between 1978-79 and 1982-83.

GLC (Net Revenue Expenditure)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide an analysis of the Greater London council's 1984-85 budgeted net revenue expenditure, broken down by service, for each service to be transferred from the Greater London council to the London boroughs and other bodies including the Fire Board, the Thames water authority, the London Planning Commission, the Thamesmead Trust, the Historic Building Commission, the Lee Valley regional park authority, the Residuary Body, the Sports Council, the Arts Council, the Inner London education authority, the shire counties and the shire districts.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 29 November 1984, c. 561]: Following is the available information, by service, of the GLC's and ILEA's 1984-85 budgeted net current expenditures:

			£ million
GLC*	(i)	Fire (including civil defence)	127
	(ii)	Land drainage and flood protection	7
	(iii)	Lee Valley Regional Park Authority†	4
	(iv)	Other‡ (mostly to boroughs)	396
ILEA			900

* Excluding passenger transport revenue support, which becomes the responsibility of London Regional Transport. Under the abolition proposals fire and civil defence would become the responsibility of a London borough joint board, and land drainage and flood protection the responsibility of the Thames water authority.

† Services will not be transferred from the GLC to the Lee Valley regional park authority.

‡ GLC's budget return does not provide sufficient further detail to break down expenditure into the remaining categories requested. Most of this sum relates to functions which would pass to the London boroughs on abolition.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Blood Donations (Screening Tests)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to ensure that regional blood transfusion centres have available to them the resources to carry out HTLV 3 antibody screening tests on blood donated.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 22 November to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) at column 326.

Death Grant

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider measures to increase the death grant to £250; and if he will make a statement on the estimated cost to public funds of such an increase.

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the death grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The Department is currently receiving an average of nine letters a week from hon. Members and members of the public concerning the death grant. We have been continuing to give consideration to our policy towards the grant in the light of the response to the consultative document published in March 1982, which revealed no public consensus in favour of any of the options proposed. This consideration will now be carried forward within the context of the wider re-examination of social security which my right hon. Friend has set in hand. The estimated additional cost of increasing the grant to £250 would be £125 million.

Invalidity Allowance

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he proposes to introduce legislation (a) to offset invalidity allowance against the additional component and (b) to introduce a common earnings rule for dependency additions to invalidity benefit.

Mr. Newton: Yes. As I indicated on Second Reading of the Social Security Bill on 26 November at column 711-2, the necessary amendments will be put down for discussion at the Committee stage of that Bill.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many invalidity pensioners receive (a) no invalidity allowance, b) lower-rate invalidity allowance, (c) middle-rate invalidity allowance and (d) higher-rate invalidity allowance; how many in each category receive an earnings-related additional component with their invalidity pension; what, in each case, is the average additional component; and how many in each category receive an additional component which exceeds their invalidity allowance.

Mr. Newton: The following table provides the information requested as at 2 April 1983, the latest date which information is available.

	(a) No IVA	(b) Lower-rate IVA	(c) Middle-rate IVA	(d) Higher-rate IVA
Number of IVB beneficiaries by entitlement to IVA	119,000	281,000	153,000	184,000
Number of IVB beneficiaries receiving AC	89,000	147,000	60,000	69,000
Average amount of AC	£2·98	£2·88	£2·46	£1·80
Number of IVB beneficiaries receiving AC which equals or exceeds IVA	89,000	82,000	11,000	1,100

Notes:
IVA = Invalidity Allowance
IVB = Invalidity Benefit
AC = Additional Component

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates to be the net savings from his proposal to offset invalidity allowance against the additional component; and what the savings would be but for the transitional arrangements for existing invalidity pensioners.

Mr. Newton: It is estimated that the net savings in a full year in 1985-86 terms will be in the region of £25 million. Without transitional protection for existing beneficiaries, savings in the first year would amount to an estimated £50 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether transitional protection for existing invalidity pensioners, receiving both invalidity allowance and additional component, will preserve the real value or the cash value of their benefit.

Mr. Newton: The transitional arrangements will provide for the cash value of invalidity benefit in payment to existing beneficiaries to be preserved when the proposed change is introduced.

Low Income Families

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report data from the family expenditure survey on the numbers on low income along the same lines as for 1979 and 1981.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available estimates are those for 1981. Similar estimates for 1983 will become available during the course of next year.

Trent RHA (Funding)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the funding of the Trent regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Trent has been a major beneficiary from our policy of distributing health resources more fairly throughout the country. Over the past six years Trent has consistently received a higher rate of growth than the national average. Between 1978-79 and 1983-84, revenue spending by the region has increased by over 18 per cent. compared with general inflation. Nationally, revenue spending has increased by about 15 per cent. As a result the region has moved closer to its target allocation. It is now some 4½ per cent. below its RAWP target compared with 7½ per cent. in 1978-79. The short term growth assumptions we gave the region in September show this trend continuing.

Merrell-Dow Corporation

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the products purchased by his Department from the Merrell-Dow Corporation during the last financial year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 19 July at columns 332-3.

Warnock Report

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the findings of the Warnock report, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received over 300 letters from hon. and right hon. Members, 24 from organisations and over 230 from the general public. The Government will consider very carefully all the comments received in response to the report before announcing conclusions.

Local Offices (Overtime)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hours of overtime have been worked per month at Heron house and Arpley house benefit offices in Stockport in the current year; what is the monthly cost; and how much it would have cost to work these hours with extra permanent staff.

Mr. Whitney: Overtime working falls into two categories: that which, because of its nature, can only be done outside normal office hours (for example evening visits to people who are not available during the day); and that which could be done during office hours, but due to other factors needs to be undertaken as overtime in order that it can be carried out on time (for example peaks of work at seasonal times, or unpredictable peaks of work).

I assume the hon. Member is concerned with the second category because it is in this category that some attempt at comparing costs can be made with the cost of employing additional staff during normal working hours. However, as will be evident from the table, overtime is being done at the local offices to which the hon. Member refers to cope with a peak of work and it would be uneconomic to have permanent staff who would be without work for the rest of the year.

The number of hours worked in the second category, together with the cost (which is available only for four weekly periods) is set out in the table.

Pharmaceutical Exports (Code of Practice)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what preparations are being made by Her Majesty's Government for the World Health Organisation meeting in 1985 which will discuss a code of practice for multinational companies exporting pharmaceutical products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At the World Health Assembly in Geneva in May, the United Kingdom supported a resolution on the rational use of drugs. This included a request to the Director-General of the World Health Organisation to arrange a meeting in 1985 of experts (including Governments, pharmaceutical industries, patients' and consumers' organisations) to discuss the means and methods of ensuring the rational use of drugs through improved knowledge and flow of information and to discuss the role of marketing practices especially in developing countries.

The World Health Organisation is at present planning the conference but has not yet agreed the agenda. In response to a request from the World Health Organisation the United Kingdom Government have offered $50,000 towards conference costs.

Depo Provera

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence is available to him about the risks to women of the injectable contraceptive Depo Provera.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Evidence on the possible adverse effects of Depo Provera was considered by a panel of persons appointed to hear an application by Upjohn Ltd. for a product licence to market Depo Provera as a long-term contraceptive. The panel's report was submitted to us in April this year and copies were placed in the Library.

Generic Prescribing

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which recommendations of the Greenfield report on generic prescribing he has accepted; which rejected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I gave to the House on 8 December 1983, at columns 477-79, in which I said that the Government had rejected a scheme of generic substitution as proposed in the Greenfield report on effective prescribing. We are however continuing to encourage doctors themselves to prescribe drugs of all kinds by generic name whenever possible. This recommendation was but one of fourteen. All the others were accepted when the report was published in February 1983.

Home Care Allowances

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the availability of readily comprehensible information to the general public regarding allowances payable to them when being cared for at home and needing 24 hours per day attention and surveillance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I am satisfied that the leaflet FB18, which is published by the Department for the use of people who are housebound and disabled, is readily available. The leaflet describes allowances payable to people who are disabled and includes a coupon for ordering forms on which claims to those benefits can be made.

The FB18 leaflet is distributed through social services departments and health authorities to those people who work in the community and are most likely to come into contact with housebound disabled people — social workers, district nurses, general practitioners. Copies are freely available from the Department's leaflet unit, and are also held by local social security offices.

Diabetics (Central Register)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will finance the setting up of a central register and recall system to alleviate present difficulties that arise in the standard management of diabetic problems and complications; and if he will set up a limited pilot scheme.

Mr. John Patten: The organisation of treatment for diabetic patients is a matter for each district health authority and we have no reason to believe that a central system is required. I understand that some districts already have computerised district records.

Carbon Monoxide

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will fund a campaign to alert and to protect householders from the health-damaging effects of low-grade carbon monoxide intoxication.

Mr. John Patten: The Department of Trade and Industry, British Gas, the Health Education Council and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents have all publicised this topic. Our Department is currently collecting further data related to the health effects and these will help us form a view on whether any further action is required.

Family Practitioner Committees

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will agree to remunerate chairmen of the family practitioner committees soon to be created.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of family medical practitioners he envisages will occupy the posts of family practitioner committee chairmen.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no percentage in mind. The calibre of people, including family practitioners, willing to serve as chairmen is high. We shall appoint the people best suited to the job.

Ambulance Station, Newcastle-under-Lyme

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will refuse permission for the closure of the ambulance station in the Newcastle-under-Lyme constituency.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that agreement with the community health council on the closure has not been reached, and that the proposal is consequently likely to be referred to us under the established consultation procedures. We shall consider the arguments carefully before making a final decision.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services approximately how much his Department has had to spend in advertising in order to inform pensioners and other claimants how they can collect their money during the social security staff strike in Newcastle.

Mr. Newton: To date, the Department has spent £1,239,500 on advertising the emergency payment procedures during the social security staff strike in Newcastle.

Benefits

Mr. Critchley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total sum in unemployment and other benefits paid to the unemployed and the sum paid to those under 20 years, 20 to 30 years, 31 to 40 years, 41 to 50 years, 51 to 60 years and 61 to 65 years, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The main benefits payable to unemployed people are unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit and housing benefit. The estimated total cost in 1984-85 is £6·5 billion. A breakdown of this total by the age-bands requested is not readily available.

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider seeking to give local officers of his Department discretion to continue payment of unemployment benefit without interruption when claimants report income from other sources of less than £4 per week.

Mr. Whitney: Unemployment benefit is paid on a daily basis and the earnings limit is £2 a day. If claimants earn less than this figure, payment of benefit is unaffected. If they earn above the limit, benefit will be adjusted. In either case the flow of payments should not normally be interrupted. There are no plans to change this limit, which has applied since March 1982. Other resources of less than £4 a week do not affect unemployment benefit.

Pensionable Age

Mr. Critchley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost to the Exchequer of lowering the pensionable age for males from 65 to 60 years and from 65 to 64 years.

Mr. Whitney: Estimates provided for the Social Services Committee indicated that at 1981-82 benefit rates, the net costs to central Government funds were £2½ billion a year and £0·4 billion a year respectively. Details of the underlying assumptions are in the third report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1981-82 (HC 26 — II) pages 14-16, 407-409 and 457-461. These estimates are currently being updated.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much is to be spent in cash terms and real terms on the National Health Service in 1984; and how that compares with 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: NHS expenditure in Great Britain will have increased from £7·7 billion in 1978-79 to £16·6 billion in 1984-85; an estimated increase of 21 per cent. over general inflation. These figures demonstrate the Government's commitment to the NHS.

Dentists

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what steps he is taking to enable dentists to acquire more up-to-date equipment;

(2) if he will increase the incentives to dentists to encourage them to acquire more up-to-date equipment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Dentists are paid by means of a scale of fees which is set in such a way that the average dentist will earn the target average net income set by the Government and have his practice expenses met. The latter include expenses incurred as a result of the purchase of new equipment. We are satisfied that the fee scale makes a reasonable provision towards the cost of any essential new equipment and no additional incentive is required.

Youth Training Schemes

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if 16-year-old school leavers in the year 1984-85 will have their supplementary benefit withdrawn if they refuse a place on the youth training scheme.

Mr. Whitney: If a claimant, without good reason, refuses a suitable youth training scheme placement, or leaves prematurely, supplementary benefit may be reduced for a period not exceeding six weeks under regulation 8 of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations. This provision applies to school leavers during the current year in the same way as to any other claimants.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children live in families with incomes (a) below supplementary benefit levels, (b) at the supplementary benefit level, (c) 10 per cent. above the supplementary benefit level and (d) 20 per cent. above the supplementary benefit level compared with 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The latest information is contained in the tables "Low Income Families — 1981" a copy of which is lodged in the Library.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many wrongful refusals of single payments for furniture were found in the course of the Social Security Policy Inspectorate's inquiry on this subject; and what action was taken to correct any such errors found.

Mr. Whitney: We have not yet received the report of the social security policy inspectorate's inquiry into single payments for furniture, although I understand it is nearing completion. Decisions to refuse claims for single payments are made by independent adjudication officers, subject to a right of appeal to social security appeal tribunals and (on a point of law) to the social security commissioners.

Social Workers

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report all those local authorities which under the Mental Health Act 1983 have not so far appointed an approved social worker under the Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are aware of only one, the London borough of Hackney, and appointments in that authority are understood to be imminent.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has anything to add to his reply of 30 October, Official Report, column 959, about housing benefit high rent schemes.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on 16 November 1984 at column 381-2, we are also considering whether action needs to be taken to curb a possible abuse of joint tenancy arrangements for housing benefit purposes and are tomorrow referring proposals to the local authority associations.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Derby, South may expect to receive the letter on the effects of the housing benefit uprating promised in his answer of 30 October, Official Report, columns 960-1.

Mr. Newton: I regret that some delay has occurred as a result of operational difficulties with the relevant computer, but expect to be able to write to the hon. Member very shortly.

Social Security Reviews

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what subjects the Social Security Policy Inspectorate has undertaken inquiries but not yet finalised its reports; and on what date each of these inquiries commenced.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of Wednesday 21 November, Official Report, columns 203-43, which Government Departments have provided information and evidence to the social security reviews; from which Departments officials have attended meetings of the review teams; and which Government Departments have been afforded the right to be present at meetings of the inquiry teams into housing benefit, supplementary benefit and benefits for children and young persons.

Mr. Newton: Information relating to other Departments is fed into the social security reviews in a variety of ways: in some cases it is already held in the Department; in others it is supplied by other Departments to the review team secretariats for incorporation in papers; and in some cases review teams have requested papers on specific subjects. Other Departments have also been kept in touch, through normal official machinery, with the progress of the reviews. Officials from other Government Departments, including those listed as follows, attend review team meetings at the discretion of the chairman of the review teams:

Department of Employment
Department of Environment
Government Actuary's Department
Inland Revenue
Department of Health and Social Services — Northern Ireland
Department of Trade and Industry
Treasury

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those voluntary organisations which have received a cut in real terms in their funding under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The general scheme of grants under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 is used for two main purposes. One is to support specific projects for a specific period, perhaps on a pump-priming basis; this includes experimental or innovative local schemes of potential wider significance. The other is to help with a national organisation's general costs, taking account of developing policy interests and the organisation's ability to fund its activities in other ways; grants of this kind sometimes reflect an understanding that the amount or proportion of grant will reduce over time as the organisation's ability to find other sources of funding grows. Thus there can be no simple presumption that the sizes of grants to an organisation in different years are directly comparable. Since 1978-79, total expenditure on these section 64 grants has risen by £5,777,000 (35 per cent. in real terms.)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total funding to the voluntary sector under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 for each quarter since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The table shows payments to voluntary organisations each quarter under the general scheme of grants under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. The proportion of the annual total paid in the last quarter of the financial year reflects among other things the fact that grants are approved continuously throughout the year but revenue grants are generally paid in up to four instalments depending on the date of approval. Since 1978-79, the total expenditure on these grants has risen by 35 per cent. in real terms.

	June (£000)	September (£000)	December (£000)	March (£000)	Total (£000)
1978-79	690	1,049	1,025	1,681	4,445

"Helping the Community to Care"

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those organisations with which his Department liaised in the earlier "supporting the informal carers initiative", indicating which were directly consulted before setting up the new "Helping the Community to Care" scheme.

Mr. John Patten: Hundreds of organisations, voluntary and statutory, were involved with the "supporting the informal carers" exercise. The 10 reports produced, copies of which I have placed in the Library, explain and illustrate the scale and scope of the exercise. All these organisations accordingly played a part in the development of those elements of the "Helping the Community to Care" programme that are aimed at improving support for informal carers and which flowed from the exercise.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what proportion of the £10·5 million of the "Helping the Community to Care" scheme has now been allocated; to which organisations; and for which purposes;

(2) if he will list all voluntary organisations working directly with his Department on the "Helping the Community to Care" scheme.

Mr. John Patten: The "Helping the Community to Care" programme is made up of 12 distinct elements which have the common purpose of assisting volunteers, families and others to care for people who need support.

The table lists these elements. Discussions are still in progress with a large number of voluntary interests and where particular bodies have accepted an invitation to participate in management of a part of the programme their names are included. For most elements only limited sums have been committed so far to meet initial expenditure. Allocation of the total sum between the various elements will depend on settlement of the detailed arrangements in each case.

Helping the Community to Care Programme

Name of Element	Organisations which have agreed to manage part of the programme
1. Home from hospital schemes for elderly patients	Age Concern British Red Cross Society
2. Information and training for careers of elderly people suffering from incontinence	Kings Fund Age Concern
3. Support for elderly members of ethnic minorities	*
4. Development officers for self help/mutual aid groups	NCVO Volunteer Centre
5. After-care for patients with chronic schizophrenia	Southampton, Salford and one other health authority
6. Industrial therapy advice unit	British Institute for Industrial Therapy

8. Community resource centre for mentally handicapped people	*
9. Information and training for informal careers	Kings Fund
10. Demonstration districts for services for informal careers	*
11. Family self-help centres	*
12. Asian mother and baby campaign	Save the Children Fund Small number of health authorities

* Discussions still in progress.

Paediatric Medicines (Sweeteners)

Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards the use of sweeteners in paediatric medicines; what sweeteners are currently approved by his Department and used in manufacture; and how their use is reviewed.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Managers)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why it is necessary for Ministers to approve draft short lists before appointment of regional and district managers in the National Health Service can proceed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our guidance to health authorities makes clear that, in discharging our responsibility to oversee the appointments process, Ministers should have an opportunity to consider all health authorities' proposals for the identification of a suitable person to carry responsibility for the general management function.

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people applied for the post of general manager of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far I understand that about 20 applications have been received. All information about individual candidates for general manager appointments must remain confidential.

Limited List Prescribing

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the medical bodies he has consulted and proposes to consult regarding his proposals for a limited list prescribing on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are now consulting with the following medical bodies:

British Medical Association
General Medical Services Committee
Joint Consultants Committee
Community Medicine Consultative Committee
Central Committee for Hospital Medical Services
Hospital Junior Staffs Committee
Royal College of General Practitioners
Royal College of Physicians

Expenditure Cuts (Greenwich)

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the Greenwich borough council and the Greenwich district health authority about the effect of cuts in local health and social services in relation to the planned redevelopment of services for the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill; and what action he proposes to take to enable the agreed programme to go ahead and targets set by his Department to be reached.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment have received letters sent jointly by Greenwich health authority and the London borough of Greenwich. Revenue allocations for Greenwich HA are a matter for the South East Thames regional health authority. The RHA has been concerned to ensure that its RAWP redistribution policy does not prevent the development of priority services. It has introduced funding policies for mental illness and mental handicap which apply to all districts and are designed to encourage the development of locally based services. In addition it has made capital allocations to Greenwich HA to develop services for the mentally handicapped and is presently awaiting further proposals from Greenwich for these and for services for the mentally ill.

Mobility and Attendance Allowances

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applicants for (a) mobility and (b) attendance allowances have appealed to medical appeals tribunals in each of the last five years; how many have been successful; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: As regards mobility allowance, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 21 November at column 201-2. As regards attendance allowance, cases are considered not by medical appeal tribunals but by doctors on behalf of the Attendance Allowance Board. On this the information is as follows. The figures of successful reviews include cases where the condition of the claimant has deteriorated as well as cases where the claimant is dissatisfied with the outcome of his claim.

Attendance Allowance

	Reviews	Decided in claimant's favour
1980	21,598	16,288
1981	20,816	14,849
1982	25,150	17,443
1983	29,843	19,819
*1984	24,118	16,758

* To 28 September.

Essential Needs Grants

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received in relation to his revised policy regarding essential needs grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Our broad policy on single payments of supplementary benefit for exceptional needs has not been revised since introduction of the regulated supplementary benefits scheme in 1980, although detailed changes have been made from time to time. The policy is being considered as part of the current review of the supplementary benefit scheme as a whole. The review has received evidence from a wide range of organisations and individuals.

NHS (Lithotripter)

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has plans to introduce the lithotripter into general service in the National Health Service; and what is his estimate of the numbers of population which can be served by each such machine.

Mr. John Patten: It is estimated that the lithotripter shortly to be installed at St. Thomas' hospital will enable 1,200 patients to be treated annually. Three quarters of these will be National Health Service patients. Arrangements are in hand for this service to be evaluated, and the findings of the study will be taken into account in deciding whether lithotripsy should be made more widely available within the NHS.

Health Services (Bolton)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in each of the last five years from (a) the North-West regional health committee, (b) Bolton regional district health committee and (c) Bolton community health council, about the level of health service provision in Bolton.

Mr. John Patten: [pursuant to his reply, on 19 November 1984, c. 69]: The hon. Member will be aware that I and my right hon. and learned Friend have visited Bolton health authority to hear at first hand about Bolton's needs. A careful search of our records has revealed no direct representations from the health authorities or the community health council. This is hardly surprising as representations should be made to the regional health authority, which is in close contact with Bolton district health authority about its strategy for the future.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

ILEA (Budget)

53. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his discussions with the Inner London education authority about its budget.

Sir Keith Joseph: Mrs. Morrell, the leader of the ILEA, came to see me with a few of her colleagues on 19 November to discuss a number of issues. They told me of their intention to set a budget for 1985-86 on 20 November. They claimed that it would not be possible to make reductions sufficient to meet the expenditure level of £900 million determined by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment without causing severe damage to the service. I emphasised that they would not be able to decide a level of expenditure for 1985-86 without regard to the Rates Act 1984. I noted that ILEA's budget in recent years had increased at twice the rate of inflation despite falling school rolls, and said that there should be plenty of scope for economies. I expressed concern that ILEA's expenditure was disproportionate to its results. The greater part of the money raised by the ILEA came from business and had an effect on jobs in London. If ILEA had thought its case good enough it should have approached my right hon. Friend for a redetermination of its expenditure level.

49. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received regarding the Inner London education authority's budget proposals for 1985-86.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have received a substantial number of letters both directly and through right hon. and hon. Members. In addition, ILEA has given me a copy of the responses to its consultation document on the 1985-86 budget. I met a delegation from the ILEA on 19 November and discussed with them, among other subjects, their proposed action on a budget for 1985-86.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

8. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the technical and vocational education initiative.

Sir Keith Joseph: The first 14 projects in the technical and vocational education initiative have just entered their second year. Forty-eight additional projects commenced this term in England, Wales and Scotland, and authorities not at present participating in the Initiative have been invited to join in 1985 or 1986. Arrangements have also been made for the monitoring and evaluation of the initiative over future years.

19. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications for secondary education of the technical and vocational education initiative.

Sir Keith Joseph: The 14 pilot projects which began in September 1983, and the further 48 which began this term, are still at an early stage of development. As the students normally take part for four years, it will be some time before the implications of the initiative for secondary education can be fully assessed.

Teachers

16. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he has been sent by the advisory committee on the supply and education of teachers on the number of teachers required to put into practice current educational policies by 1993.

41. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the advisory committee on the supply and education of teachers on the number of teachers needed by 1993.

Mr. Dunn: The committee has advised that, on the Department's principal projection of pupil numbers, the primary and secondary schools of England and Wales would in 1993 require a total of 416,000 full-time teachers for this purpose.

Educational Maintenance Grants

33. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schoolchildren have received educational maintenance grants for each of the last five years; and what has been the value of those awards in each of the local authorities.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the number of pupils who receive educational maintenance allowances is not collected centrally. The value of awards in each local authority for the last five years available is as follows:

LEA expenditure on EMA's in Seconddry Schools

	1978-79 £	1979-80 £	1980-81 £	1981-82 £	1982-83 £

Educational Maintenance Allowance

17. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost of providing educational maintenance allowances for 16 and 17-year-olds in full-time education at the rate of £25 per week, 52 weeks per year.

Sir Keith Joseph: About £550 million for England only.

Research Councils (Budgets)

18. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the Medical Research Council and the Science and Engineering Research Council about the level of their budgets for next year.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend met the chairman and the secretary of the Medical Research Council on 23 July and discussed that council's financial position. He has had no discussions with the Science and Engineering Research Council about the level of their budget for next year.

Secondary School Places

20. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied that the statutory appeal procedure on the allocation of secondary school places affords parents a fair hearing.

Mr. Dunn: Yes.

Chenet and Sherbrook Schools, Cannock

21. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce his decision concerning the proposal to amalgamate Chenet and Sherbrook schools in Cannock.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend will announce his decision at the earliest practicable date commensurate with a full and careful consideration of all circumstances of the cases.

Student Awards

22. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received from individuals and public bodies concerning the proposed changes in student grants.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received some 1,730 representations from individuals and some 70 from public bodies.

28. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the question of students' grants.

42. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many letters he has received about the level of student grants for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

48. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the revised system of parental contributions to student grants.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received some 2,010 representations about the changes in student grants in 1984-85 and some 1,800 about the proposed changes in 1985-86.

30. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will estimate how many students will receive, through the travel component of their grant, more than they need to spend; and how many will receive less than they need to spend.

Mr. Brooke: It is too early as yet to estimate students' travel expenditure under the new arrangements introduced on 1 September this year.

34. Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the maximum amount a parent can be asked to contribute next year towards one student at university outside London, grants and fees taken together; and at what income level that maximum becomes payable.

Mr. Brooke: The maximum amount of the parental contribution will vary according to the individual circumstances of the student and his family; but in the academic year 1985-86 no family will be asked to contribute more than £4,000. The parents of a student studying outside London and receiving an average amount of allowance in addition to his basic grant will next year be expected to contribute a maximum sum, to include fees, of about £2,400. This level of contribution will apply to a family with a residual income of about £19,500.

37. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the National Union of Students and the National Union of Students, Scotland, on the Government's proposal to abolish the minimum grant and to charge tuition fees to some parents.

61. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met leaders of the National Union of Students to discuss grants and fees for higher education.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend met the president of the National Union of Students yesterday.

39. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received advocating the introduction of student loans for those receiving higher education.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have received no representations solely on the subject of the introduction of a loans scheme. A number of correspondents may have made this point in letters which were principally about other matters, but the records kept by the Department are not sufficiently sensitive to identify these.

40. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied that the level of educational grants available for higher and university education are adequate to ensure that no young person who can benefit from such education is debarred from doing so because of a lack of financial resources.

Mr. Brooke: Yes.

50. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the number of parents who do not pay the full parental contribution towards the student maintenance grant.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available. My right hon. Friend has received 1,610 representations about the changes in the parental contributions in 1984-85 and 1985-86, a number of which made reference to parents who do not pay their contributions in full.

54. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he proposes to take to provide assistance to those students in higher education whose parents refuse to sign their grant assessment forms and are thus liable to pay fees and not to receive a grant.

Mr. Brooke: The Government very much hope that all parents will co-operate with the grant assessment procedure and will pay their assessed contributions in full. Any formal measures to protect students whose parents do not do so would inevitably be open to abuse.

59. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received following his announcement of changes in the arrangements for student grants.

64. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on parental contributions to student maintenance and tuition fees.

Mr. Brooke: I would refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Berkshire East, (Mr. MacKay), for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

60. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will monitor the effect of the new arrangements for student loans with a view to determining the number of undergraduates whose parents are not willing to pay their assessed contribution towards fees.

Mr. Brooke: No arrangements have been made for student loans. There are no plans to collect information about the number of parents who fail to pay their assessed contribution in full.

Unemployment

23. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his Department's contribution to Lord Young's review of schemes to assist the unemployed.

Sir Keith Joseph: Within his remit to promote policies for the growth of enterprise and job creation, the Minister without Portfolio is looking at provision for the 14 to 18 age group. The Department of Education and Science is playing its part in the necessary discussions.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

24. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average pupil-teacher ratio in Somerset as compared to the national average.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1984 the overall pupil-teacher ratio for primary and secondary schools in Somerset was 19·4 : 1, compared with 17·9 : 1 in England.

Information Technology

25. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to encourage increased information technology content in the curriculum of secondary schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government are already taking steps to increase the information technology content in the secondary curriculum through initiatives such as the micro-electronics education programme and the technical and vocational education initiative.

Education Act 1981

26. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on progress on implementation of the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the authorities are making good progress towards implementing the Education Act 1981. It is inevitable that full implementation will take time and that progress in some areas will be quicker than others.

Adult Education (Civil Defence)

27. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has issued any guidelines for the inclusion of courses for civil defence volunteers in part-time or whole-time adult education.

Mr. Brooke: The Department has issued no such guidelines. The training of civil defence volunteers is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Deaf Persons (Teachers)

29. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has yet reached any conclusion in connection with the recommendation by the advisory committee on the supply and education of teachers that the mandatory requirement of a specialist qualification for teaching the deaf be removed.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales are considering the recommendations of the report and will announce their decisions in due course.

Secondary Education Examination

31. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the proposed distinction and merit awards will be in operation in connection with the new general certificate of secondary education examination.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I intend to bring forward proposals for distinction and merit certificates shortly. Subject to consultation, I would expect these certificates to be available to qualifying candidates in the first GCSE examinations in summer 1988.

Students (Travel Costs)

32. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with universities, polytechnics and higher education colleges where students have particularly high travel costs, about steps to ameliorate the problem.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Teachers (Pay and Appraisal)

35. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made towards the appraisal of teachers and restructuring of teachers' pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Burnham joint working party on salary structure meets tomorrow to resume consideration of the employers' proposals for a reformed pay structure for school teachers.

Maintained Schools (Surplus Places)

36. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the number of surplus primary and secondary school places that remain in English maintained schools.

Mr. Dunn: Between January 1981 and December 1983, it is estimated that local education authorities took out of use some 265,000 primary and 135,000 secondary school places; and that this left some 1,200,000 surplus primary and 500,000 surplus secondary places in use in January 1984. Authorities continue to make significant savings through the removal of surplus places and my right hon. Friend has agreed with the local authority associations that fresh targets should be set for the removal of places by 1987 and for future years.

Nursery Education

38. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much it would cost in capital and recurrent expenditure to provide (a) part-time and (b) full-time nursery education for all three and four-year-olds.

Mr. Dunn: An estimate would require detailed information on a number of matters—for example, the location and numbers of those in the age group not now provided for, the location and availability of spare capacity and the extent of new building provision required—which could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

"Teaching Quality"

43. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what responses he has received to the White Paper "Teaching Quality", and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Eighteen organisations and a number of individuals made comments on the White Paper "Teaching Quality". The Government are pursuing vigorously the policies which it outlined. Achievements to date include the promulgation of criteria for the approval of initial training courses for teachers, the establishment of a council for the accreditation of teacher education, and the introduction of grants to local education authorities for the further training of serving teachers in designated areas of national priority. Her Majesty's inspectors are now engaged in an extensive programme of visits to all teacher training institutions.

Further Education

44. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the participation rate of 16-year-olds and 17-year-olds staying on in full-time education.

Sir Keith Joseph: Forty-five per cent. of 16-year-olds and 32 per cent. of 17-year-olds in England were in full-time education in January 1984.

Institute of Information Technology

45. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he plans to discuss his proposed establishment of an institute of information technology with local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Plans have recently been announced to establish a private institute with support from a number of companies engaged in the field of information technology. Discussions about this development would be a matter in the first instance for those involved.

School Curriculum

46. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement as to his general intentions regarding development of the school curriculum.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government will continue, in discussion with their partners in the education service, to seek broad national agreement on the objectives of the curriculum in the primary and secondary phases; and to encourage the formulation and implementation within that framework of curricular policies at LEA and school level.

Expenditure

47. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what level of spending the Government plan by local authorities on education, including meals and milk, in 1985-86.

Mr. Dunn: In its plans for local authority current expenditure in 1985-86, the Government have allocated £10,259 to education, including meals and milk. This represents an increase of about 6 per cent. in cash over the sum allocated to education in 1984-85, after allowing for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge and the transfer of some funding within non-advanced further education to the MSC. In addition, it is likely that, as in previous years, authorities will choose to devote to education some of that part of total current expenditure which is not allocated between services.

Pupils (Special Educational Needs)

51. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Education Act 1981 regarding the integration of children with special educational needs into mainstream schools.

Mr. Dunn: There is an increasing demand from parents of children with special educational needs, particularly those with young children, for admission to ordinary schools and a growing trend for LEAs to make the first placement for such children in ordinary nursery schools or classes, or ordinary primary schools, where this is consistent with an efficient use of resources. Where such a placement would be more expensive than a place in a special school or unit, the authority is under no obligation to meet the parent's wishes.

Open University

52. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about discussions he has had with the Open University about its future level of funding.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend yesterday met the chancellor of the Open University, together with senior officers of the Open University's council. He noted the views expressed and agreed to consider the representations made.

Bradwell and Trinity High Schools, Newcastle-under-Lyme

55. Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be able to make an announcement on the proposed closure of Bradwell high and Trinity high schools in Newcastle-under-Lyme.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend will announce his decision at the earliest practicable date commensurate with a full and careful consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

Peace Studies

56. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about Government policy concerning the teaching of peace studies in schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I set out our views on peace studies in the speech I made at a conference organised by the National Council of Women on 3 March 1984, a copy of which is in the Library.

Higher Education (Access)

57. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is currently considering any specific proposals for widening access to higher education without excessive cost to the taxpayer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is currently considering the future development of higher education generally in the light of the advice he has received from the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education, and plans to bring forward his proposals early next year.

London (Further and Higher Education)

58. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning policy for further and higher education in London.

Mr. Brooke: The Government expect that further and higher education opportunities in London will be provided as cost-effectively as possible in order that all students who have the ability to benefit can be accommodated within current limits on resources. The National Advisory Body for Higher Education (NAB) has an important role in advising on student numbers and resource allocations. Following receipt of NAB advice, my right hon. Friend will be making a considered response to the ILEA's proposals on their advanced further education provision, taking account of other provision for further and higher education in the London area and elsewhere as appropriate.

Parental Contribution (Statistics)

62. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set up investigations into the proportion of families deemed to be paying parental contributions which have other dependent children.

Mr. Brooke: No.

School Closures

63. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether, when a local education authority proposes to close a school, it is the practice of the Secretary of State to obtain an up-to-date report on the school from Her Majesty's Inspectorate.

Mr. Dunn: Where proposals made by local education authorities under section 12 of the Education Act 1980 to close schools fall to my right hon. Friend to decide, one of the factors he has to consider in reaching his decision is where the balance of educational advantage lies for the pupils involved. In order to make this judgement, he takes account of all the available information, including that which can be supplied readily by members of Her Majesty's inspectorate in the area. In view of the volume of proposals to close schools, the lead times involved, and the other demands on the time of Her Majesty's inspectors, it would not be practicable for my right hon. Friend to ask for formal inspections, leading to published reports, on all schools which LEAs were proposing to close.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Civil Service

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking in response to the report of an investigation by the Fair Employment Agency for Northern Ireland into the non-industrial Northern Ireland Civil Service.

Dr. Boyson: A comprehensive policy statement enunciating the principles underlying the Government's approach to the promotion of equal opportunity for all will be published later today. The trade unions have been fully consulted in its preparation.

The statement affirms our commitment to equal opportunity, on the basis of individual merit, and without regard to religion, sex or any other factor which should be irrelevant to the treatment or assessment of any individual. Appropriate monitoring arrangements are being put in place in respect of 1985 onwards.

Copies of the statement have been placed in the Library.

Local Government Elections

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what date in 1985 will be polling day for local government elections in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: 15 May. This follows from schedule 5, paragraph 1 of the Electoral Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1962, as substituted by schedule 2, paragraph 8 of the Northern Ireland (Local Elections) Order 1977, which sets the date as the third Wednesday in May in an election year.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the categories of, and the actual commodities or services concerned or referred to directly or indirectly, in the reasoned opinion he has received from the Commission of the European Communities in respect of article 169 of the treaty of Rome, referred to in the reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 28 November, Official Report, column 476; and if he will place a copy of the communication and any reply by Her Majesty's Government in the Library.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to the answer, 3 December, Col. 17]: The goods and services which form the subject of the reasoned opinion are listed fully in the press release issued by the Treasury on 15 October, the text of which I will with permission annex to this answer.

In my reply to the hon. Member on 28 November (Col. 476) I said that the United Kingdom Government do not accept the Commission's views. A reply to the reasoned opinion has been sent to the Commission. This questions the basis on which the Commission allege that the zero rates in question are not permitted under article 28 of the sixth VAT directive. In the United Kingdom Government's view the Commission's interpretation of the term "final consumer" is not supported either by the second or sixth VAT directives.

In the reply, attention has also been drawn to two errors of fact. The first concerns sewerage and water; the second concerns construction and associated services, where the Commission has failed to take account of the changes in the 1984 Finance Act.

While I am anxious to keep the House fully informed about this matter, it has not been the practice to deposit in Parliament documents such as the reasoned opinion and the reply, which are confidential to the Commission and the Government.

Following is the press release:

15 October 1984

VALUE ADDED TAX: THREATENED INFRACTION PROCEEDINGS ON ZERO RATES

The EC Commission has taken the formal step of sending the UK Government a 'Reasoned Opinion' under Article 169 of the Treaty of Rome alleging that certain aspects of the VAT zero rates in force in the United Kingdom are contrary to the provisions of the Sixth VAT Directive which established Community rules for the structure and coverage of VAT.

The Reasoned Opinion is not a general attack on the UK zero rating system. It questions the application of specific zero rating groups to goods or services frequently supplied to the business sector.

The United Kingdom Government was given until early November to consider the Reasoned Opinion. A full response will be given after detailed consideration of the arguments but it is the view of Treasury Ministers that our zero rates accord with the provisions of the Directive which was adopted in 1977. We therefore cannot accept the views expressed in the Opinion.

Under the Directive Member States were permitted to retain zero rates in existence at the end of 1975 provided that they had been implemented 'for clearly defined social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer'. Insofar as zero rates cover supplies made to businesses and not to the general public, the Commission considers that they are not in accordance with the Sixth Directive, a view which the UK Government does not accept.

The items which are under challenge are as follows:

(i) Live animals of a kind used for food; animal feeding stuffs, food producing seeds and plants;

(ii) Sewerage services and water, but only where a specific charge is involved—services provided through a water rate are outside the scope of VAT;

(iii) Newspaper advertisements and news services (but not newspapers);

(iv) Fuel and power (coal, gas, electricity, oil) when supplied to businesses, ie domestic consumption is not under challenge;

(v) Construction of buildings and associated services, other than housing 'within a social policy' a term which the Commission does not define;

(vi) Protective boots and helmets for industrial use insofar as sold to businesses and not private persons.

DEFENCE

Military Exercises (Land Use)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the arrangements by which his Department negotiates with landowners for the use of their land for military exercises; and at what stage in this process local authorities are consulted.

Mr. Lee: It is the practice in Wales for the Property Services Agency to make arrangments with landowners for the use of their land for military training. There is no requirement to consult the local authorities unless the military use of land for training exceeds 28 days in any one year.

5 Airborne Brigade

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether 5 Airborne Brigade has conducted any exercises outwith the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: Since its formation from 5 Infantry Brigade in November 1983, 5 Airborne Brigade has taken part in Exercise Lionheart in the Federal Republic of Germany during September 1984.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Butler: I refer my hon. Friend to the full list of grants-in-aid payable by the Ministry of Defence which appears in Vote 1, section K of the defence Estimates 1984-85, and also to the same section of the revised estimates (14 June 1984). As recently announced by my right hon. Friend, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, it is our intention, subject to parliamentary approval, to introduce an additional grant-in-aid for the Royal British Legion in 1985-86 with the object of financing visits by war widows to their husbands' graves overseas.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Butler: The Department does not identify and record the specific disabilities of registered disabled staff. The figures requested are therefore not available.

Pirbright Ranges

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Defence on whose authority an improvised close quarter battle range was first established on Pirbright ranges.

Mr. Lee: All close quarter battle facilities on military ranges are established in accordance with range standing orders. Targets and firing positions can be varied by the officers running the training within certain established guidelines.

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Defence when there was last a qualified full-time range officer responsible for the supervision of all Army ranges in the Pirbright area.

Mr. Lee: A full-time range officer has been in post at Pirbright ranges since 1969. A similar appointment was made at Ash ranges in February 1984.

Equipment Suppliers

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the cost criteria with particular reference to overhead margins laid down by the Procurement Executive in relation to suppliers of defence equipment and components.

Mr. Butler: The elements which are allowed into overhead costs for Government non-competitive contracts are established by accounting conventions recommended by the Review Board for Government Contracts. The last Report from the review board was received in January this year and certain changes were made to the conventions. It would not be appropriate therefore to institute another review at this time.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he is satisfied that all signals recorded as having been transmitted (a) from HMS Conqueror to Flag Officer Submarines and (b) from Flag Officer Submarines to HMS Conqueror were properly authorised during the period 1 to 4 May 1982;

(2) if, from the records now available to him, there is any evidence of unauthorised signals being sent (a) from HMS Conqueror to Flag Officer Submarines or (b) from Flag Officer Submarines to HMS Conqueror during the period 1 to 4 May 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions an order was transmitted to the Captain of HMS Conqueror to sink the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 27 November, c. 416]: I cannot add to what was said on this matter in paragraph 10 of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's letter to the hon. Member of 19 September. It is not possible to say how many times the original order conveying the change in the rules of engagement on 2 May was rebroadcast.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Luce: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office employed registered blind people during each of the last four years as follows:

1981 - 3
1982 - 3
1983 - 4

Exporting Companies

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what surveys have been undertaken by his Department to ascertain the level of support given by other industrialised countries through the commercial sections of their embassies and consulates to their exporting companies.

Mr. Rifkind: No surveys have been undertaken. The character, scale and organisation of export services provided by our major competitors vary so widely according to their political and administrative systems that it is difficult to draw fair comparisons and to assess the relative merits or values. The Federal Republic of Germany, for example, provides most of its export services overseas through its chambers of commerce, to which all businesses in the Federal Republic are required by law to belong.

The British Overseas Trade Board, which directs and develops our export promotion services, collects a certain amount of information about other countries' services. Indications are that the net effects of these are broadly similar to our own.

Diplomatic Immunity (Car Accidents)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions in each year since 1964 a British subject in the United Kingdom has suffered personal injury or damage to property as a result of a car accident involving another party whose diplomatic immunity prevented the British subject taking a civil action for damages in the courts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Claims arising from motoring offences are settled by the diplomat's insurance company. Persons entitled to immunity are not exempt from the obligation to carry third party insurance, and insurance companies gave us specific assurances some years ago that they would not attempt to invoke the immunity of diplomatic clients in this context. The assurances have been carried out.

We have no means of knowing how many times diplomatic immunity has been claimed in civil cases, whether or not such cases arose out of a motoring accident.

ENERGY

Power Stations

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the cost of making available the information referred to in the answer to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, (Mr. Nellist) Official Report 19 November, column28, about numbers of power stations in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Goodlad: About £600.

Coal Stocks (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his response to the proposals made in the report by the Industry and Employment committee of the Greater London council on transfer of coal stocks to power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: I see absolutely no need to contemplate the measures advocated in this report. Stocks of fuel at power stations, together with continuing supplies, should be sufficient to meet full electricity demand well into next year.

TRANSPORT

Edinburgh-Aberdeen Railway Line

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will support a feasibility study by British Rail into electrification of the railway line between Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

Mr. David Mitchell: Any such study would be a matter for BR, which is responsible for planning railway investment.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Soley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the following information in relation to the mining dispute: (i) the charges laid, and the number of persons charged with each offence listed and (ii) the number of persons charged against whom evidence was not offered, or who have been acquitted.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The information to 28 November 1984 on the nature and number of charges brought by procurators fiscal as a result of incidents arising from the current mining dispute is set out in the table; of the 238 persons whose cases have been disposed of, 30 persons have been acquitted.

Mr. Soley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the following information in relation to the mining dispute: (i) the number of persons convicted, and the offences they committed, for each police force area and (ii) the number of persons remanded in custody for each police force area.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The most readily available information on persons convicted of offences arising out of the mining dispute in each police force area is set out in the tables.

The first table details, to 16 November 1984, the nature of the charges brought by procurators fiscal in those areas which have resulted in convictions; the second table details, to 28 November 1984, the number of persons convicted of such offences in each area: as at 3 December 1984, out of the total number of persons proceeded against for such offences, 18 persons were remanded in custody prior to trial; two persons were subsequently released on bail and one immediately changed his plea to that of guilty.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Jopling: On 1 April in each year the numbers were as follows:

	Number
1981	10
1982	11
1983	10
1984	11

Wetlands and Marshlands (Drainage)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much grant has been paid over any recent convenient annual period to drain wetlands or marshland designated as sites of special scientific interest.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that this information could not be provided in the form requested. As far as I can ascertain no grant has been paid in recent years on a scheme for the drainage of wetlands or marshland in a site of special scientific interest to which the Nature Conservancy Council has objected.

Butter

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he took into account the health implications and the recent report by the committee on medical aspects of food policy before agreeing to the provision of EEC butter to consumers at subsidised prices.

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that it is right that as an element in tackling the Community surplus our consumers should have the same opportunity as consumers in other member states to obtain butter at reduced prices if they wish. However, the present sale of EEC butter stocks is likely to be disruptive of the market and was introduced by the Commission in the face of opposition from several Member States including the United Kingdom.

The recent report by a panel of the committee on medical aspects of food policy did not rule out the consumption of any particular foodstuffs. I am sure that consumers will want to decide for themselves on the balance of their diet in the light of advice available to them.

Pesticides

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to receive the next annual report of the advisory committee on pesticides.

Mrs. Fenner: The decision has only recently been taken to provide an annual report of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides following the recommendation of the Seventh report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution. The intention is to provide a greater public understanding of the committee's work. The first report will be published in 1985 relating to the calendar year 1984.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he has given to the introduction of a common national framework for improving standards of competence among all who apply pesticides; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government have felt it appropriate to delay discussions on the creation of a common national framework for improving standards of competence in pesticide application until the present enabling legislation is in place, since it may have some effect on the status to be awarded to certificates of competence and other matters.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the advisory committee on pesticides has completed its examination of the usage of organochlorines in the non-agricultural sector; and what conclusions it has reached.

Mrs. Fenner: The remaining uses of persistent organochlorine pesticides are kept under continuing review so that, in keeping with Government policy, they can be phased out when satisfactory alternatives become available.

It has not yet been possible for the Advisory Committee on Pesticides to undertake a comprehensive review of all the non-agricultural uses of persistent organochlorines, but individual pesticide uses have been reviewed and are withdrawn where appropriate. Thus all the wood preservation uses of dieldrin other than for industrial pre-treatment are being withdrawn with effect from 31 December 1984.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the commodities covered by the common agricultural policy, including rapeseed, olive oil and so on (a) the amounts currently in surplus, (b) the target/intervention/threshold price in the United Kingdom, (c) the corresponding central price for the European Economic Community, (d) the corresponding price for West Germany, (e) the levy in the United Kingdom at the latest available date and (f) the world price.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 22 November 1984, c. 267]: Table 1 shows on the basis of the best available information the level of self-sufficiency in the Community for those products where this exceeds 100 per cent. Information on fish and a number of other minor products is not readily available and can be produced only at disproportionate cost. Meaningful figures are not available for fresh fruit and vegetables.

Table 2 sets out the institutional prices requested.

Table 3 shows the levy applicable and the notional world price on 21 November 1984 for the main traded agricultural commodities. The "world prices" shown are generally the estimated lowest offer prices at the Community frontier underlying the Commission's calculations of the variable import levies. I remind the hon. Member that these are the lowest prices recorded and it is highly likely that on average higher prices would have to be paid if larger quantities were to be purchased on world markets.

‖ Prices vary seasonally and, in some cases, to take account of other factors such as variety and presentation. The prices shown are the lowest seasonal figure for the standard presentation.

¶ Producers' organisations voluntarily withdrawing produce from the market receive compensation at the buying-in price plus 10 per cent. of the basic price.

● Intervention prices for cheese apply only to certain varieties manufactured in Italy.

■ Reference prices for frozen fish only. Reference prices for imports of fresh and chilled products are equal to the withdrawal prices.

* "World" prices have been calculated by subtracting the levy applicable on 21 November from the threshold/guide price. The beef price is also adjusted for duty. In the case of pigmeat, poultry meat and eggs, the "world" price has been taken as the sluicegate price, less supplementary levy where appropriate. The resulting estimate has been converted from ECU/t at the appropriate market rate of exchange £0·620128 = 1 ECU.

† The rates of levy vary for different tariff headings. The rates quoted are: beef and veal—carcase; pigmeat—carcase; poultrymeat—70 per cent. chickens; rice—wholly milled long grain; olive oil—virgin lampante; eggs—in shell including supplementary levy.

‡ Most imports of beef from third countries are subject to special arrangments allowing entry at reduced levy rates.

‖ Imports of lamb under voluntary restraint agreements with principal suppliers and related agreements are subject to a reduced charge of 10 per cent. ad valorem. Any imports outside these arrangements are subject to levies which cannot exceed the 20 per cent. tariff rate bound in the GATT.

¶ A special lower rate of levy is applicable to imports of butter from New Zealand.

● In practice the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are normally covered by the Lome Convention and enter the Community levy-free.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Rates

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the estimated level of water rates in (a) the West Midlands county and (b) the London and Thames Valley region, in each of the next three years.

Mr. Macfarlane: The level of charges will not be known until the water authorities concerned finalise their budgets for the years in question. However, as the Government intend to set higher financial targets for all water authorities over this period it is to be expected that charges increases will be above the general rate of inflation.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the revised financial targets for the Ordnance Survey for the financial year 1985-86 onwards.

Mr. Gow: Following recent discussions on the OS plan and its estimates I expect to consult the ordnance survey advisory board and other Government Departments soon. Updated guidelines will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish the detailed response to the recommendations of the ordnance survey review committee.

Mr. Gow: Shortly.

River Thames (Freight Handling)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions or directions he has given to the British Waterways Board concerning its freight handling services in the River Thames, Lea, and Brent.

Mr. Macfarlane: None.

Coliform Bacteria

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has initiated any negotiations with the Commission of the European Communities with a view to introducing a better sampling and analysis regime for coliform bacteria.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution has recommended, in its tenth report, that the Government should initiate negotiations with the Commission of the European Communities with a view to introducing a better sampling and analysis procedure for coliform bacteria.

So far no action has been taken in respect of the Royal Commission's recommendation. This report is being studied and the Government's response will be published next month.

Sewage Discharges

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department will set a date by which the recommendation of the working party on sewage disposal relating to discharges of crude sewage is to be implemented in full.

Mr. Macfarlane: No.

Water Authorities (Financial Targets)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial targets have been fixed for the English regional water authorities for 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Macfarlane: The English water authorities were set financial targets (expressed as a rate of return on net assets) as follows:

Water authority	Financial years 1983-84 Rate of return Percentage	1984-85 Rate of return Percentage
Anglian	2·06	1·36
Northumbrian	1·87	1·25
North West	1·26	0·95
Severn-Trent	1·25	1·25
Southern	1·25	0·91
South West	1·47	1·26
Thames	1·25	0·50
Wessex	1·50	0·61
Yorkshire	1·25	1·00

Footnote:

The financial targets for the two years are not directly comparable, because of various technical adjustments effected in the 1983-84 Accounts.

Merseyside (Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Merseyside.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I was prevented by injury from attending the opening of Lime Street Station and Concourse and the Liverpool freeport by Her Royal Highness The Princess Anne on 29 November 1984. My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale attended on my behalf.

Following the ceremonies, my noble Friend joined the royal party for lunch at the offices of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. He later visited the Albert dock and maritime museum complex.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls (Disposal)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the tonnage of polychlorinated biphenyls due for disposal in 1984 due to scrapped transformers; and how this disposal is likely to take place.

Mr. Gow: My Department estimates that approximately 150 tonnes of polychlorinated biphenyls from scrapped transformers will have been disposed of in 1984 in the United Kingdom. The PCBs were contained in up to 1,000 tonnes of other materials. The method used for disposal is high temperature incineration.

Avon Structure Plan

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, in his consideration of the Avon county structure plan, he will take steps to reduce the total number of new houses planned for Woodspring; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received proposing a reduction in the total number of new houses planned for Woodspring under the Avon county structure plan; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The provision and broad distribution of new housing in the Avon county structure plan are matters currently before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Before my right hon. Friend approves the structure plan in its final form, the proposed policies relating to housing provision (including that in Woodspring) will be very carefully considered in the light of national planning policies; the submitted structure plan; the report of the panel which conducted the examination in public; and all the representations made on my right hon. Friends proposed modifications to the plan. A substantial number of representations on the proposed modifications were from those seeking a reduction in the proposed level of housing in Woodspring; but I must make it clear that my right hon. Friend's decision in relation to any one area can be only in the context of his consideration of the structure plan as a whole.

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in his consideration of the Avon county structure plan, he will take steps to prevent further development of green field sites within the Woodspring district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The actual location of housing development in Woodspring, as elsewhere, is in the first instance for determination by the relevant local planning authority through the local plan process and planning control procedures, taking account of the broad guidance in the Avon county structure plan, when it is approved.

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, in his consideration of the Avon county structure plan, he will take steps to ensure the development of land within the city of Bristol for housing purposes rather than green field sites in rural areas; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he is taking to evaluate whether the draft Avon county structure plan complies with the guidance given in circular 15/84 regarding land use in existing urban areas; what conclusions he has reached; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The proposed level of housing development in Bristol, and other existing urban areas, in Avon will be considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when he approves the county structure plan. In determining that level, my right hon. Friend will have regard to the need to make the fullest possible use of existing urban sites, in accordance with Government policy — including that set out in Department of the Environment Circular 15/84. The Avon structure plan, as submitted, made provision for 9,900 dwellings in the city of Bristol. My right hon. Friend accepted the view of the panel which conducted the examination in public that this provision was of the right order and represented a fair assessment of the land either available or likely to become available during the plan period. His proposed modification set the figure at 10,100.

Housing

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the percentage of his budget currently allocated to housing.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend's plans for his public expenditure programmes for 1985-86 were set out in answer to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) on 12 November at column 68-69.

Property Services Agency

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has asked the Metropolitan police to undertake further investigations into the Property Services Agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: In an article in the News of the World on Sunday 11 November it was reported that PSA staff had been on holidays arranged by, and accepted other favours from, contractors with whom they had dealings.

The five staff concerned were interviewed and it is clear that their relationships with the contractor require investigation. All five were therefore suspended from duty on Monday 12 November, and all the contractors mentioned by the News of the World precluded from bidding for further PSA work without the express approval of the PSA director of contracts. The newspaper made a number of items of evidence available to PSA; the agency immediately contacted the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Housing Associations (Accounting Requirements)

Sir Michael Shaw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about relaxations to the statutory accounting requirements for small housing associations.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend, in conjunction with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales, has today laid the Registered Housing Associations (Limited Accounting Requirements) Order 1984, made under section 124 of the Housing Act 1980. It provides relief to those small housing associations with not more than 100 units of accommodation that are not undertaking grant-aided development or improvement by reducing the accounting information otherwise required under the provisions of the Registered Housing Associations (accounting Requirements) Order 1982. It is anticipated that the exemptions provided will reduce significantly the work necessary in submitting their accounts to the Housing Corporation in a form which will continue to provide full accountability. The provisions of the Order will apply to accounting periods beginning on or after 1st January 1985.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which London local authorities would gain and which would lose from his proposals that the collective funding of voluntary bodies should be met by contributions based on population rather than rateable value; and what would be the percentage change in the contribution for each authority.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 29 November 1984, c. 557]: Our proposals are designed to ensure as far as possible that ratepayers in each borough make an equal contribution in rate poundage terms to the collective scheme, as they do at present to the cost of GLC grants through its precept. The proposals therefore would minimise changes to ratepayers — whether gains or losses—in comparison to the present situation.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Post Offices (Closure)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has issued to the Post Office on the subject of the post office closures in line with the requirements of section 59(2) of the British Telecommunications Act 1981 to have regard to the industrial, commercial and, in particular, the social needs of the United Kingdom in the provision of postal services.

Mr. Pattie: It would be unnecessary and inappropriate to issue such guidance to the Post Office. The duty imposed on the Post Office by section 59(2) of the British Telecommunications Act 1981 is a statutory one of which the Post Office needs no reminder.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the Post Office Users Council concerning the social aspect of the current closure programmes of a percentage of sub-post offices.

Mr. Pattie: I have had no discussions with the Post Office Users' National Council on the Post Office's proposals to reduce the number of post offices in urban areas. However, I am aware of the council's views about the proposals, and that the Post Office has consulted the council fully about the proposals.

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a general direction to the Post Office under section 62 of the British Telecommunications Act 1981, to refrain from its major programme of closing Crown and sub-post offices in view of its obligations under section 59(2)(b) of the Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie [pursuant to the reply, 24 November, c. 551]: No. My powers under section 11(1A) of the Post Office Act 1969 to give the Post Office directions of a general character as to the exercise of its powers are exercisable only when it appears to me to be "requisite in the national interest". I am not satisfied that it would be so requisite in the present instance. Indeed, I am satisfied that the Post Office's proposals to reduce the number of post offices in urban areas are consistent with the duty of the Post Office laid down by section 59(2) of the British Telecommunications Act 1981.

Regional Aid

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will establish a system of positive vetting when considering applications for regional grants for projects which involve a high import value content relative to employment created; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Regional grants can not be made conditional on the purchase of United Kingdom goods without breaching international treaty obligations. However, applicants for regional selective assistance are expected to give every opportunity to United Kingdom suppliers to compete.

Clothing, Footwear and Textile Investment Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the EEC to approve funding of the clothing, footwear and textile investment scheme.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend is not yet in a position to say when the European Commission will reach a decision on the request we made in April for approval of the proposed scheme of investment support for small and medium sized firms in the clothing, footwear, knitting and textile industries. Discussions are continuing, and we remain committed to seeking an early positive conclusion.

Post Office (Lost Mail)

Mr. James Hill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints have been received from users of the postal service regarding mail which has gone astray whilst in the possession of the Post Office over the last 12 months.

Mr. Pattie: Complaints about mail which has gone astray are an operational matter and are therefore forwarded to the Post Office. We do not keep records of the numbers.

Electrical Imports (Complaints)

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what proportion of complaints relating to electrical goods received by the trading standards authorities and the consumer safety unit concern goods imported from the eastern bloc, the Indian sub-continent and the far east, respectively;

(2) what proportion of complaints relating to electrical consumer goods received by the trading standards authorities and the consumer safety unit concern goods imported from the eastern bloc, the Indian sub-continent and the far east, respectively.

Mr. Fletcher: No information is available on the proportion of complaints received by trading standards authorities and the consumer safety unit which involve imported electrical goods.

The evidence from recent successful prosecutions by the enforcement authorities shows that the great majority of consumer electrical goods found by the courts to be unsafe are imported, and that most of these imports are from the eastern bloc and the far east.

Trading standards authorities and the consumer safety unit have responsibility for the safety of electrical goods for use in the home. The safety of electrical goods for professional and workplace use is the responsibility of the Health and Safety Executive.

United States (Steel Imports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the United States market for steel was allocated to imports from the EEC in the informal agreement negotiated between the EEC and the United States of America in 1982.

Mr. Channon: The informal agreement, by exchange of letters in October 1982, on steel pipe and tube exports did not establish any binding limit but provided for consultations in the event of EC exports exceeding the 1979-81 average share of United States apparent consumption, which was 5·9 per cent.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the actual percentage of the United States steel market which was taken up by imports from the EEC in 1983 and in 1984 to date, respectively.

Mr. Channon: In 1983, United States imports of all steel mill products from EC countries accounted for about 5 per cent. of the United States market. Comparable figures for 1984 are not yet available, but in the first three quarters of 1984 the average level of Community exports of ECSC steel products to the United States was about one-fifth higher than the average level in 1983.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why EEC exports of steel to the United States of America have exceeded the percentage agreed in the 1982 informal agreement; and what steps were taken by Her Majesty's Government and the other members of the EEC to ensure that the arrangement was adhered to.

Mr. Channon: Since the 1982 informal agreement did not establish a binding limit on EC exports for steel pipes and tubes to the United States, there was no question of Her Majesty's Government or the Government of any other EC member state seeking to impose a limit on its producers' exports.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the United States market for steel has been allocated to the EEC under the regulation made in November 1984 by the United States Department of Commerce; and how this percentage compares with the percentage agreed between the EEC and the United States of America in 1982.

Mr. Channon: The action announced by the United States Administration on 27 November implemented a binding restriction on United States imports of steel pipes and tubes from the EC of 5·9 per cent. of the United States market. This is the same percentage as the indicative, non-binding figure, referred to in the 1982 EC-United States exchange of letters on pipes and tubes.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what restrictions, by way of quota, tariff and price limitation, are imposed by the EEC on imports of steel from countries outside the EEC; and if any special provision is made for imports from the United States of America.

Mr. Channon: The customs duties applicable to iron and steel products imported into the Community are set out in chapter 73 of the common customs tariff. Information about these rates is also available in Her Majesty's customs and excise tariff and overseas trade classification, a copy of which is in the Library. Anti-dumping or coutervailing duties are in force against a number of products from third country suppliers: part 13 of the tariff and overseas trade classification gives details of these duties. Voluntary restraint arrangements by which major suppliers to the Community undertake to limit their exports to traditional levels were negotiated in 1984 between the Community and Sweden, Finland, Norway, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Poland, Bulgaria, Japan, Australia, Spain, South Korea, South Africa and Brazil. These voluntary restraint arrangements incorporate a number of autonomous quotas on products from the CMEA countries of eastern Europe imposed by individual member states prior to establishment of the European Communities, and still maintained. In addition, the United Kingdom has quotas on certain products from the USSR and the German Democratic Republic: details of these are set out in notice to importers No. 1995 published in British Business on 17 February 1984.

Imports from countries not subject to quotas and with whom VRAs have not been negotiated—of which the US is one—are subject to no quantitative restrictions. Such imports are monitored against import reference prices published by the European Commission. These prices are intended to serve as a benchmark for the application of the Community's dumping regulations.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government support the statement made by the Common Market Commission on the restrictions on steel imports imposed by the United States Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Government entirely share the Community's concern and disappointment that the United State's authorities rejected out of hand proposed terms for a binding restraint arrangement on EC exports of pipes and tubes, and proceeded to unilateral action without further consultations. The Community has fully reserved its GATT rights. The Government will keep the House informed of developments.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken by the EEC since 1982 to reduce the restrictions on the import of steel from non-EEC countries.

Mr. Channon: The basic principle of the steel voluntary restraint arrangements is to allow the signatory countries to maintain their traditional trade with the Community, taking account of the development of the Community market. This is in line with the OECD consensus in 1977 that anti-crisis measures should be on the basis of burden-sharing. To achieve this, the Community has sought to renew annually the quantitative aspects of the arrangements on the basis of forecast Community steel consumption. The depressed state of the market in 1982, 1983 and 1984 meant that it was not possible to increase access levels in these years.

However, in line with improvments in demand in 1984 and the Government's policy of reducing barriers to trade, we have supported increased access levels under the 1985 regime. Negotiations between the Commission and our partners are continuing on this basis. There have been no major changes in the non-quantitative aspects of the arrangements since 1982.

Advertising (EC Directive)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have for implementation of the European Community directive on misleading advertising adopted by the Council of Ministers on 10 September last.

Mr. Fletcher: The Government propose to implement the directive by regulations under the European Communities Act 1972, following consultation with the relevant interests.

Manchester Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effect for Manchester international airport of the decisions on regional aid announced by the Minister of State on 28 November and, in particular, on whether aid from the European regional development fund will still be available for the further development of the airport.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to the reply, 3 December]: Manchester international airport is located outside the part of the Manchester TTWA which has been designated an assisted area and would not qualify for the regional aid announced on 28 November nor, normally, for ERDF aid. However, under the terms of article 18 paragraph 2, of the ERDF Regulation 1787/84 which comes into force on 1 January 1985, aid may be granted for all or part of infrastructure investment projects which although not located in an eligible region or area, are situated in an area adjacent to such a region or area and are an essential complement to its infrastructure. In such cases, the ERDF's aid will cover only that part of the project which is necessary to the development of the region or area in question. The amount of the resources allocated for finance of the investment projects referred to in this paragraph may not exceed 4 per cent. of the ERDF's resources. The Department of the Environment, in consultation with the Department of Transport, is now considering an application from Manchester international airport for European regional development fund aid towards the further development of the airport. If approved this would be forwarded to the EEC for further assessment from 1 January 1985, but no guarantee can be given that the Commission will support the application.

Merseyside

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he envisages the changes in the Government's regional industrial policy will affect Merseyside over the next three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to the reply, 3 December]: The changes in regional policy announced on 28 November are intended to relate grants more closely to job creation and to concentrate resources on those areas with the most severe problems. They are thus aimed at improving the long-term employment opportunities in areas such as Merseyside, which will continue to enjoy the highest category of regional assistance.

Knowsley

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list all financial aid from central Government and the European Commission direct to industry in the borough of Knowsley during 1984-85 showing the amount involved in each category.

(2) what is the value of regional development grants and selective financial assistance to Knowsley in 1984-85; what was their value in 1983-84; what their estimated value will be in 1985-86 and 1986-87; and what form this assistance will take following his statement of 28 November to the House.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to the reply, 3 December]: Information about expenditure on regional industrial assistance is kept by reference to employment office areas, but in the case of regional development grants only payments over £25,000 are allocated in this way. The borough of Knowsley is not conterminous with any EOA but covers parts of several. Information about payments of regional development grant and offers of regional selective assistance is as follows:

	1983-84		1984-85*
EOAs (parts of which are in Knowsley)	RDG: total of payments of over £25,000	Selective Financial Assistance Offers	RDG: total of payments of over £25,000	Selective Financial Assistance Offers
Kirkby	4,000	1,687	1,855	325
Widnes	2,659	932	915	36
Huyton	244	1,058	134	28
Prescot	1,017		245

* To 30 September 1984.

It is not possible to produce reliable estimates of regional development grant expenditure and of selective financial assistance offers for 1985-86 and 1986-87 in respect of these areas.

Under the new map of assisted areas, Knowsley is a development area. Eligible projects undertaken in Knowsley will therefore be eligible for grant under the new RDG scheme. Selective assistance will also be available for projects which create jobs or which protect existing employment, but which otherwise may not go ahead. Payments of RDG will also continue to be made under the transitional arrangements relating to the old RDG scheme. Information about other financial aid to industry in Knowsley from central Government or direct from the EC Commission is not available.

PRIME MINISTER

Nuclear Power

Q32. Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister what percentage of Britain's energy needs will be supplied by nuclear power by the year 2000.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Nuclear electricity production in the year 2000 will depend on many factors, including the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry.

Supplementary Benefit

Q62. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister how many people are on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The number was 4·3 million at December 1983, the latest date for which information is available.

Wales (Regional Development Aid)

Q117. Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister if she will ensure that regional development aid to Wales will not be diminished as a result of Cmnd. 9111.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The Government's new regional industrial policy arrangements announced last week ensure that Wales will continue to be able to compete fully and effectively for mobile investment and jobs. Some 89 per cent. of the working population of Wales will be within the assisted areas and parts of Wales in most need will receive the maximum available level of support.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

Q119. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will make personal representations to the leaders of the countries in the European Economic Community regarding the Commission decision to buy untried aircraft for the Leeward Islands Air Transport; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that discussions are continuing between LIAT and the Commission. We expect the rules for approving contractors to be fully and fairly applied by the Commission and shall continue to make this clear.

Engagements

Mr. Beith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 December.

Mr. Freeman asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 December.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 December.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is attending a meeting of the European Council in Dublin.

European Community (Purchasing Policies)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if, in her next communications with the heads of the European Economic Community countries, she will indicate Her Majesty's Government's intention to withhold payment to the European Economic Community pending an inquiry into the purchasing policies of the Commission; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The British contribution to the European Community is fixed by treaty obligations.

Multi-Department Scrutiny

Mr. Eggar asked the Prime Minister whether she will publish the report on the multi-department scrutiny of consultancy, inspection and review services in Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Yes. I have today arranged for a copy of the efficiency unit's report to be put in the Library. The report points to a further stage in the Government's financial reforms begun in 1982. I endorse its recommendations and look to the leadership of the Civil Service to implement them.

Crown Appointments Committee

Mr. Frank Field asked the Prime Minister if she will list the membership of the Crown Appointments Committee at the time of the appointment of the present Archbishop of Canterbury and its composition at each subsequent appointment.

The Prime Minister: The Crown Appointments Commission consists of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, three members elected by the house of Clergy of the General Synod, Three members elected by the House of Laity of the General Synod, my private secretary for appointments, and the Archbishops' appointments secretary (these last two being non-voting members). To these are added, on the occasion of each vacancy, four members elected by the Vacancy in See Committee of the Diocese concerned.

The elected representatives are the responsibility of the Church of England.

When the Archbishopric of Canterbury is vacant, the Prime Minister appoints a lay person to chair the Commission for that vacancy. When the See of Canterbury was last vacant Sir Richard O'Brien was appointed to undertake this responsibility.

Franco-British Council

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Prime Minister why she appointed the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to attend the current year's conference of the Franco-British Council.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was invited to attend the conference by the Franco-British Council, and has attended previous conferences organised by the Council. The Secretary of State for Employment, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and my noble Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, also attended the conference.

National Heritage Memorial Fund

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will list the trustees of the National Heritage memorial fund, stating in each case their profession or, where retired, former profession and other information relevant to their trusteeship of the fund.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

Lord Charteris of Amisfield: (Chairman). Private secretary to the Queen and Keeper of HM's Archives 1972-77; Trustee of the British Museum since 1979.

Baroness Airey of Abingdon: Trustee of the Dorneywood Trust and Stansted Park Foundation.

Lord Anglesey: Vice-Chairman of the Welsh Committee of the National Trust; Chairman of the Historic Buildings Council for Wales; Trustee of the National Portrait Gallery.

Sir Robert Cooke: The Government's Special Adviser for Palace of Westminster; Board member of the British Tourist Authority nd Chairman of its Heritage Committee.

Professor F. Holliday: academic; Vice President of the Civic Trust for the North East; Trustee of the Scottish Civic Trust.

Mr. Martin Jacomb: barrister and banker.

Mr. Clive Jenkins: trade union leader; member of the General Council of the Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Charles Kinahan: brewer; Chairman of the Northern Ireland Historic Buildings Council since 1973.

Mr. Michael McCrum: academic; the Master of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge.

Sir Norman Macfarlane: industrialists; President of the Royal Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts; Governor of the Glasgow School of Art; Patron of the National Art-Collections Scottish Fund.

Professor B. Morris: academic; member of the Museums and Galleries Commissions; Trustee of the National Portrait Gallery.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Television (Concessionary Licences)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give figures for the numbers of licences granted under the concessionary television licence scheme in the following categories: (a) pensioners, (b) the disabled, (c) hotels and (d) others.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A single accommodation for residential care licence covers all retired and disabled people in a particular residential home or sheltered housing scheme and so the number of licences issued does not correspond with the number of beneficiaries. At the end of September 1984, we know that about 567,000 retired people and 1,000 disabled people benefited from the concession. Under separate arrangements, some 42,000 registered blind people received a reduction in their licence fees. There is no formal concession for hotels, and licensing practice is to be changed on 1 January to require all except small hotels to pay higher fees according to the number of guest rooms they equip with television.

Embarkation and Arrival Cards

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the reason for the decision to abandon the requirement for the public to complete embarkation and arrival cards under the Prevention of Terrorism (Supplemental Provisions) Order 1984 at Heathrow airport; and if these cards are still issued for completion at Gatwick airport.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The use of these cards is at the discretion of the examining officer, under the direction of the chief officer of the police force concerned. I understand that at Gatwick airport all passengers are required to complete cards; at Heathrow the requirement is normally imposed selectively but, from time to time and for limited periods, it is applied to all passengers.

Isle of Man

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the composition of his Department's delegation to the Isle of Man on 4 December and state the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A delegation of officials, headed by an assistant under-secretary of state, will represent Her Majesty's Government at a meeting of the Joint Standing Committee on Common Interests of the Isle of Man and the United Kingdom, which is to be held in the Isle of Man on 5 December. These meetings are held from time to time to discuss matters of mutual interest. It will include officials from the Home Office, Her Majesty's Treasury and Inland Revenue, but it has yet to be decided whether other Departments need to be represented.

Public Disorder (Circulars)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will place in the Library copies of (a) Home Office circular 26, 5 March 1982, on national reporting centre, mutual aid and police support units and (b) Home Office circular 39, 26 March 1982, on monitoring the potential for serious public disorders.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. These are confidential circulars to chief officers of police.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all grants made by his Department to voluntary organisations, giving both the recipient and the amount, together with the date a grant was first made.

Mr. Waddington: The grants made to voluntary bodies in the 1983-84 financial year are as follows. The dates on which grants were first made are not readily available, but I will endeavour to supply the information to my hon. Friend in due course.

Additionally, an amount of grant is allocated each year to the deficit funding of more than 300 hostels and similar accommodation schemes, administered by some 200 voluntary organisations, providing places for ex-offenders. In 1983-84 such grants amounted to £3·528 million.

A further allocation is made in respect of once-for-all grants to voluntary organisations providing day facilities and other services for ex-offenders. These grants amounted to £501,356 in 1983-84.

Association of Chief Police Officers

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will give a full breakdown of the cost of the secretariat of the Association of Chief Police Officers of which 90 per cent. is met from Class IX, Vote 7, of the 1984-85 Supply Estimates;

(2) what information he has as to the numbers of staff employed by the secretariat of the Association of Chief Police Officers; and if he will provide such information as he has on its work.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The estimated expenditure of £157,938 in 1984-85 includes £127,250 for the salaries and related costs of the general secretary and his eight executive and clerical staff, £29,625 for office accommodation and £1,063 for office expenses.

The task of the secretariat is to collate and disseminate information of potential interest to members of the association and to service and co-ordinate the work of its specialist committees.

Wormwood Scrubs Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently in D wing at Wormwood Scrubs prison; and how many of these are serving life sentences.

Mr. Mellor: On 28 November 1984, there were 264 prisoners in D hall at Wormwood Scrubs prison. Of these 223 were serving life sentences.

Prisons (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison cells on the most recent convenient date (a) had integral sanitation, (b) had night time access to sanitation and (c) had neither integral sanitation nor night-time access to sanitation.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that the information readily available does not distinguish between places with integral sanitation and others affording night access to sanitation. On 30 June 1984, a total of 17,311 places in prison department establishments had some means of night access to sanitation and 21,722 places had none.

Data Protection Act

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce the appointed day for registrations under the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: An order will be made under section 42(1) of the Data Protection Act 1984, appointing the day on which applications for registration may begin to be made, as soon as it is clear when the data protection registrar's office will be ready to begin receiving applications. The registrar, who took up office on 20 September, is at present engaged in wide-ranging consultations with interested groups and organisations with a view to devising appropriate registration procedures and is also in the process of recruiting staff. Good progress is being made and current indications are that preparations may be completed by the end of summer 1985. The order under section 42(1) will be made in good time before the "appointed day" to give users adequate opportunity to prepare their applications.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Brittan: Central records of registered disabled persons employed by the Home Office do not include the nature of the disability. The number of registered disabled persons employed at 1 June in each of the past four years is as follows:

	Number
1981	217
1982	204
1983	186
1984	198

Liquor Licensing

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his plans and the time scale of considering the introduction of flexible liquor licensing hours in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: We have no immediate plans for legislation on this matter. However, my right hon. and learned Friend is keeping the matter under review, and he will consider carefully the results of a survey, commissioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, into the working of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, which introduced the facility for extended permitted hours in Scotland. The results of the survey are expected in mid-1985.

Unconvicted Prisoners (Food)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 21 November, Official Report, column 179, whether an unconvicted prisoner on remand in prison may share such food with any friends who are also unconvicted prisoners on remand.

Mr. Mellor: This is a matter for the discretion of the governor.

Probation and After Care Service

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many persons were receiving after care by the probation and after care service in each metropolitan county area at 31 December in each year since 1974 by sex and type of contact and type of after care;

(2) how many persons were supervised by the probation and after care service in each metropolitan county area at 31 December in each year since 1974 by sex and type of supervision.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 23 November, c. 302]: Summary information from 1978 is given in the following table; corresponding information is not readily available for earlier years. To provide a more detailed breakdown, including an analysis by sex, would involve disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to how much grain has now been promised by each developed country to Ethiopia over the next 12 months; how far this is short of Ethiopia's needs; and also which month each country's promised delivery is likely to arrive in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Recent commitments to Ethiopia as reported to a meeting of the food aid committee of the International Wheat Council in London on 29 November are set out in table I. These do not cover all commitments likely to be made for 1985, since donors will review their contributions in the light of changing circumstances. In addition, the Indian Government announced a pledge of 100,000 tonnes of grain for Africa, also on 29 November. The table does not include pledges of food by voluntary organisations, for which statistics are not available.

We expect to receive this week a revised forecast for Ethiopia's food import needs from the Food and Agriculture Organisation, following a crop assessment mission. Some of these will be met by commercial purchases. Information on arrivals of food aid in Ethiopia from December to March, obtained from the World Food Programme on 27 November is set out in table II. It is provisional only, since donors frequently change arrangements at short notice.

Table I
Outstanding firm commitments of food aid to Ethiopia by country

Country	Quantity
Australia	27,000 tonnes cereals
Belgium	8,000 tonnes cereals
Canada	80,000 tonnes cereals
EEC	60,000 tonnes cereals
Finland	11·5 million marks (£1·44 million) emergency—relief, including food
Netherlands	11,000 tonnes cereals
Japan	5,600 tonnes cereals plus additional aid from—$50 million pledge for Africa
Sweden	10,000 tonnes cereals
United Kingdom	21,500 tonnes cereals
United States	210,000 tonnes cereals
West Germany	14,000 tonnes cereals

Notes:
1. These commitments do not all cover the same periods.
2. The European Commission has indicated that it will propose deliveries of 10,000 tonnes a month to Ethiopia in 1985.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the preferences of type of aircraft expressed by the Governments of the 10 nations involved in the area of operation by the Leeward Islands Air Transport, the Caribbean Development Bank and the airline; if he has sought the reasons why the European Economic Community has gone against the Lomé convention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The Governments of the Caribbean Islands, the Leeward Islands Air Transport and the Caribbean Development Bank favour the immediate purchase of four British Aerospace super 748 aircraft. I have no proof that the European Commission has acted in any way contrary to the Lomé convention.

World Bank (Executive Director)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who has been appointed by Her Majesty's Government as executive director of the World Bank; when this executive director was appointed; and how often he has met the Minister for Overseas Development to discuss the World Bank report on population.

Mr. Raison: Mr. Nigel L. Wicks, formerly of Her Majesty's Treasury, was appointed as United Kingdom executive director to the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank with effect from 2 May 1983. Since he is resident in Washington, Mr. Wicks has not had direct discussions with me about the bank's 1984 world development report, which focused on population matters. However, the Overseas Development Administration did provide briefing on this aspect of the report to Mr. Wicks prior to its publication.

Lomé Convention

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the negotiations on a third Lomé convention.

Mr. Raison: As anticipated in the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) on 22 November (Col. 235) negotiations were concluded at a meeting between EC and ACP Co-Presidents on 22 November. The way was thus clear for signature of the new Convention in Lomé on 8 December.

The main features of Lomé III are as follows:

(a) The basic trade arrangements will remain substantially unchanged. ACP countries will continue to be allowed unlimited duty free access — subject to a safeguard clause — for all industrial products and the large majority of their agricultural exports to the EC. The Community has also agreed to reply within 6 months to any ACP request for improved access for agricultural products, with particular reference to concessions granted to developing third countries.

(b) The rules of origin will be somewhat relaxed and simplified, making it a little easier for ACP countries to develop industries for the processing of materials originating in third countries.

(c) The special arrangements for ACP exports of beef, bananas, and rum have been consolidated or improved. The Sugar Protocol, which is of indefinite duration and was thus not up for renegotiation, will be incorporated unchanged in the new Convention.

(d) There will be an increased amount of Community aid under Lomé III. It will come to 7,400 mecu (about £4,405 million) as against 4,627 mecu under Lomé II. There will also be European Investment Bank lending of up to 1,100 mecu (£655 million) bringing the total finance available to the ACP under the Convention to 8,500 mecu (£5,060 million). Additionally, the Overseas Countries and Territories of Member States will receive 100 mecu (about £60 million), bringing the total figure for the Sixth European Development Fund to 7,500 mecu (£4,465 million). The United Kingdom share of this will be a maximum of 1,243 mecu (£740 million).

(e) The new Convention will provide for enhanced dialogue between the Community and each ACP state to ensure that Community aid is put to the best possible use in the context of the recipient countries' own policies. There is also provision for better coordination between Community aid and the bilateral aid of individual Member States.

(f) A number of changes to the Stabex scheme were agreed, including the extension of the scheme to dried bananas, mangoes and Karite oil. It was also agreed that, in future, ACP states will give full and satisfactory information on the use of transfers. If they fail to do so future transfers may be withheld.

(g) The Sysmin scheme, which is designed to help ACP mineral producers whose production and income suffers as a result of factors beyond their control, is to be amended in such a way as to enable more ACP states to benefit.

(h) It has been agreed that, in the next Convention, there is to be a clear priority given, where appropriate, to agriculture in ACP states, notably to food production.

(i) A new chapter has been agreed for Lomé III which stresses the priority to be given within national and/or regional indicative programmes, to measures to combat drought and desertification.

(j) The chapter on Industrial Cooperation has been carried over largely unchanged, although there will be some tightening up of the management structure.

(k) There will be a new chapter on Socio-Cultural Cooperation, to stress the cultural dimension of development.

(l) The Investment Chapter in Lomé III will be much more substantial than that in the two predecessor Conventions. This should make it easier to conclude effective bilateral investment promotion and protection agreements.

(m) The Preamble to the next Convention will contain a reaffirmation of the Contracting Parties' adherence to the principles of the UN Charter and their faith in fundamental human rights. There will also be a separate Joint Declaration reiterating the deep attachment of the Contracting Parties to human dignity and their reaffirmation of their commitment to work for the elimination of all forms of discrimination.

As soon as the final text of the new Convention becomes available I shall arrange for copies to be placed in the Library. The certified text will in due course be presented training boards are also discussing with a range of bodies (including the Skillcentre Training Agency) the provision of test centres for a locality.

WALES

Skillcentres

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the number of skillcentre places per 100,000 work force in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: For each 100,000 of the work force in September 1984 it is estimated that 80 skillcentre places were available in Wales. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement about skillcentres made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment on 29 November at c. 1108-16.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will estimate the number of people financed at present by the Manpower Services Commission in Wales; and what is his estimate for 1985-86.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: At the end of October it is estimated that 36,450 people in Wales were taking part in MSC schemes for which information is available. Plans for 1985-86 have yet to be finalised.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Welsh Office has not employed any registered blind persons during the last four years. However, there are three registered partially sighted staff currently employed by our Department.

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what financial target has been fixed for the Welsh water authority for 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A financial target of 1·25 per cent. (expressed as a rate of return on net revalued assets) was set for 1984-85.
(The Welsh Water Authority (Return on Assets) Order 1984 SI1984 No. 1470.)

Job Creation

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs have been created in Wales in general, and Dyfed in particular, during the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Comprehensive information is not available. However, since 1 December 1983 projects for which offers of selective financial assistance were accepted or which were allocated Government financed factories promised to provide 17,700 jobs in Wales as a whole. For the same period the figure for Dyfed is over 1,000.

Hill Farming

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union about the profitability of hill farming in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales met representatives of the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union on 31 October and had discussions with them on the state of the hill and upland economy. Rates of hill livestock compensatory allowances to be paid in 1985 were announced on 29 November.

West Wales Hospital (Renal Dialysis Unit)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the tendering for the contract for the proposed renal dialysis unit at the West Wales hospital, Carmarthen.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Proposals have been invited for submission to the Department by 10 December. Adjudication and final decision will be by the Welsh Office. We hope to announce the decision by the end of the year.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the visit to the United States of America to the headquarters of private companies seeking to tender for the contract for the proposed renal dialysis unit at the West Wales hospital, Carmarthen, of the chairman and chief administrator of the East Dyfed health authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. This matter is a question for East Dyfed health authority in the first instance.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what funding his Department has made available for the development of an effective screening test for AIDS virus in the national blood bank; and what extra measures he intends to take following the recent incident at Newcastle upon Tyne Royal Victoria infirmary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Government financial support for AIDS research has been provided through the Medical Research Council for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is responsible.

We are strengthening our efforts to dissuade people from donating blood if they are at high risk of transmitting AIDS virus. A revised version of our leaflet "AIDS and how it concerns blood donors" is to be given individually to each donor or potential donor.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new guidelines his Department will be issuing on the donation of blood in relation to acquired immune deficiency syndrome disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The new guidelines comprise a revision of the leaflet "AIDS and how it concerns blood donors", first issued in 1983. It will contain advice, updated in the light of recent medical evidence, about groups at high risk of AIDS who should not volunteer to give blood. We will ask regional transfusion centres to ensure that the leaflet is received on an individual basis by every blood donor within the National Blood Transfusion Service.

Dentists

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the average earnings of National Health Service dentists in general practice; and what proportion of these earnings is left after staff costs, running cost of premises, rent, heat, and so on, have been deducted.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Principals working in the general dental service earned an average of £43,200 from that source in 1983-84. Information is not yet available on the average practice expenses incurred during that year. However, the dental rates study group's estimate of this figure was £26,100 and on this basis, net earnings would represent about 40 per cent. of gross earnings. These figures exclude some GDS dentists who did not work for the whole year and a small number in other groups.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to investigate more thoroughly claims and expenses submitted by dentists employed by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The recently published report of the Comptroller and Auditor General on the general dental service indicated that known fraud and irregularity were insignificant in relation to overall expenditure and that there seemed to be no reason to assume that undiscovered fraud existed to any significant extent. The report also indicated that the Dental Estimates Board's authorisation and payment arrangements had shown generally satisfactory results but that there were a number of problem areas. Substantial progress has already been made in dealing with many of these including initial arrangements for the purchase of a new computer for the Board.

Dentists do not submit claims for expenses to the board since these are reimbursed on an average basis through the fee scale.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence is available to him of the risks to women whose male partners work in heavy industry of contracting cancer of the cervix.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The most recent information available was published in the registrar general's decennial supplement for England and Wales for the years 1970-72 on occupational mortality; a copy is in the Library. This information includes data on deaths of married women by cause and by husband's occupation, and was published at the occupation order level; it does not specify the industry in which the husband worked. More recently there has been discussion in the medical press of occupational risks of cervical cancer. I refer the hon. Member to a paper by Mrs. Jean Robinson "Cancer of the Cervix: Occupational Risks of Husbands and Wives and Possible Preventive Strategies" published in "Pre-clinical Neoplasia of the Cervix. Proceedings of the 9th study group of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists October 1981"; and to correspondence in The Lancet for 24-31 December 1983 and 3 March 1984.

NHS (Drugs Budget)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the percentage of the National Health Service budget devoted to drug expenditure in 1983-84, 1973-74, 1963-64, and 1954-55.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The proportion of total National Health Service expenditure attributable to the cost of drugs (excluding the cost of dispensing) was:

	Per cent.
1954-55	9·1
1963-64	9·8
1973-74	8·5
1983-84*	10·9

* Provisional.

Note:

Over the period there were small differences in the way the basic information was assembled.

Rural Dispensing

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement as to his Department's conclusions on the effectiveness of the Crowther rural dispensing regulations; how much general practitioner applications to dispense are outstanding; and how many successful applicants are involved giving a service to (a) less than 50 patients and (b) between 51 and 100 patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The first annual report of the rural dispensing committee was published on 8 November and copies have been placed in the Library. The report reflects the growing co-operation between the medical and pharmaceutical professions on regulating significant changes in the arrangements for dispensing medicines in rural areas in England and Wales. The report also shows that the professions have found, in this Committee, a formula for achieving the provision of sensible and suitable pharmaceutical services for patients living in rural areas.

I understand that at 29 November, the Committee had 15 applications from general practitioners awaiting determination.

Since the Committee started its work 72 applications have been granted wholly or in part and in 25 of these it was estimated that the maximum number of patients immediately involved would be less than 50 and in 17 it was estimated that the number of patients involved would be from 50 to 100. It is not possible to state how many of the estimated numbers of patients will receive pharmaceutical services from their general practitioners because some may prefer to continue to receive their medicines from a pharmacy.

Drugs (Generic Prescribing)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how he ensures that the quality of generic drugs both home produced and imported are controlled and maintained at the level of purity and efficacy of the original proven brand product; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: For any medicinal product, including a generic product, to be marketed in the United Kingdom, the licensing authority has to be satisfied that the product is safe, efficacious and of good quality under the Medicines Act 1968. The licensing authority also has to be satisfied that the product has been manufactured to acceptable standards under United Kingdom (or European Community) licensing arrangements.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how his Department intends to monitor the way in which prescriptions are issued after the introduction of generic or limited list prescribing; and what consultations are planned with medical associations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will continue, for the time being, with the present system of prescription monitoring, which is undertaken by our Department in conjunction with the Prescription Pricing Authority. As well as statistical analysis it includes, where necessary, visits to individual general practitioners by doctors of the Department's Regional Medical Service to discuss their prescribing habits and prescribing matters in general. Full consultation with the medical profession on implementation of the limited list proposals is now under way.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if Her Majesty's Government regard persons living at the supplementary benefit level as living in poverty.

Mr. Whitney: As I explained to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on 23 November at c. 325, there is no generally accepted definition of poverty. The purpose of the supplementary benefit scheme is to bring a person's resources up to his or her requirements as laid down in regulations approved by Parliament.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the weekly fixed sum for heating above which a household in receipt of supplementary benefit will receive additional housing benefit where their landlord makes a fixed charge for the provision of full space heating within their rent;

(2) what is the weekly fixed sum for heating currently available to households, in receipt of the long term basic scale rate of supplementary benefit, excluding any additional requirements, where there is no fixed charge in their rent for heating, comprising (a) one adult, (b) two adults and (c) two adults and one child aged under 10 years.

Mr. Whitney: There is no specific amount for heating or any other item in the supplementary benefit scale rates. It is generally for claimants themselves to decide how to spend their benefit. Where, however, householders receiving supplementary benefit are obliged to pay a fixed charge with their rent for full space heating, they are entitled to a rebate or allowance for the amount, if any, by which the charge exceeds £6·25 a week.

Family Practitioner Committees

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will comment on the Andersen report "Computerisation of Family Practitioner Committees."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: When we published the Arthur Andersen report on the use of computers in the family practitioner services, I made it clear that the Government welcomed the report's emphasis on the use of new technology to reduce administrative costs and improve patient care at column 324-5. Having satisfied ourselves that the report points in the right direction, we have been looking at the questions that arise in implementing it and we intend to make a further statement shortly.

Salford AHA (Submission)

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the North-West regional health authority will reply to a submission by the Salford area health authority relating, inter alia, to the future of Prestwich hospital, Manchester.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I understand that the North Western regional health authority, having met representatives of Salford health authority, are urgently considering proposals in preparation for a discussion at the regional health authority's meeting on 19 December. My hon. Friend may care to contact the chairman of the regional health authority for any further information.

General Practices (Prescription Policies)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for officials from his Department to visit general practices with a view to ascertaining prescription policies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our Department's regional medical officers regularly discuss prescribing policies in the course of their visits to general practices.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants and how many children will be affected by the decision to cancel the increase in the housing benefit children's needs allowance next April; what will be the average loss; and what will be the saving to the Government.

Mr. Whitney: The decision not to proceed with the proposed increase in the child's needs allowance in April will affect about 650,000 households containing about a million children. Where income is above the needs allowance, the weekly gain for each child would have been 29p in rent rebate or allowance cases and 9p in the rate rebate cases. Where income is below the needs allowance, the weekly gain per child would normally have been 25p in rent rebate or allowance cases and 20p in rate rebate cases. The cost of increasing the child's needs allowance would have been £12 million in 1985-86.

GP Surgery, Newcastle-under-Lyme

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to make it possible for a general medical practitioner to open a surgery in Knutton, Newcastle-under-Lyme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are at present considering an appeal against a decision of the Staffordshire family practitioner committee on this matter.

Drugs (Parallel Imports)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether the level of scrutiny given to applications for product licences for parallel imported pharmaceutical products is identical with that given to abridged applications for product licences originated in the United Kingdom;

(2) whether he will indicate the level of medical or pharmaceutical scrutiny now being given to applications for product licences for parallel imported pharmaceutical products.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All applications for product licences under the Medicines Act 1968 are subjected to the level of scrutiny necessary for the licensing authority to be satisfied of the safety, quality and efficacy of the product. This varies from case to case depending upon the nature of the product and the quality of the application and the supporting data. In the case of an application for a licence to cover a parallel import from within the European Community and already licenced there, our medical and pharmaceutical advisers concentrate upon establishing that the product concerned is the same as or not therapeutically different from one already licensed in the United Kingdom but their scrutiny may extend to other matters and involve inquiries of the marketing authority in the EC exporting country if necessary. We also ensure that the product fully satisfies the labelling requirements of the Medicines Act and regulations.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in each month since the start of the youth training scheme until the latest available date, how many young people have had their supplementary benefit reduced for (a) refusing a place on the youth training scheme and (b) leaving the youth training scheme prematurely; by how much their benefit has been reduced; and how much is the total sum withheld by the Government in this way.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of young people who have had their supplementary benefit reduced because they have, without good cause refused or left prematurely a place on the youth training scheme are shown in the table.

The normal weekly rate of reduction for a claimant of YTS age during the period in question was £6·60, though different rates may have applied in a very small number of cases depending on individual circumstances. It is estimated that the total sum withheld between December 1983 and September 1984 inclusive was about £275,000.

	Refusal of place	Premature leaving
For the 4 weeks ending:
20 December 1983	175	783
17 January 1984	178	731
14 February 1984	226	1,360
13 March 1984	156	1,223
10 April 1984	87	1,087
8 May 1984	63	895
5 June 1984	47	862
3 July 1984	56	804
31 July 1984	36	627
28 August 1984	27	462
25 September 1984	25	502

Notes:

1. Records of supplementary benefit reductions for this reason were not kept prior to December 1983.
2. The numbers for the period ending 8 May 1984 are corrected figures from those quoted in the reply of 3 July to the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) at c. 139.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many jobs will be lost in the British pharmaceutical industry as a result of the introduction of limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The extent of any job losses will depend on how well companies are able to recoup in other ways lost sales to the National Health Service.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there was no prior consultation on the limited list proposals with the pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. Friend's statement on 8 November, at columns 226-228, conveyed the Government's commitment to the principle of a limited list. We are, however, consulting on the practical application of that principle.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what prior evaluation was made of the effect of the announcement of a limited list on the investment plans of pharmaceutical companies;

(2) which pharmaceutical companies are affected by the limited list; and what is the anticipated saving from each;

(3) what calculations have been made of the likely reduction in research and development by pharmaceutical companies arising from his limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Any decisions we take about the purchase of medicines by the National Health Service are bound to affect companies' sales and the various activities dependent on those sales. From information available to us we were able to indentify the companies whose sales were most at risk as a result of our decision to introduce a limited list of medicines prescribable under the NHS. The actual impact on each company will, however, depend on a number of factors, including the final shape of the proposals and the extent to which the company is able to recoup its lost NHS sales revenue from over-the-counter sales and other sources.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make arrangements to allow companies with excluded products under limited list prescription to increase prices on other products covered by the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Not automatically or as a matter of course. The profit allowed to a company under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme is based on a return on capital employed in producing medicines for the National Health Service. If a company loses NHS sales because of the limited list proposals, its capital employed, costs and allowable profit will all be reduced. In some cases this may result in actual profit falling below target, and price increases may be sought. If so, we will consider those applications in the usual way.

We are, of course, intending to make further savings as a result of our review of the PPRS, over and above the savings which will be achieved by the introduction of the

Labour Statistics

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of local jobs per hectare supported by the principal land based activities in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of local jobs provided per 1,000 hectares by the principal land based activities in Scotland are as follows:

	Number
Dairy farming	31
Lowland crop and stock farming	22
Upland mixed farming	8
Forestry	7
Hill sheep farming	1

In addition there are supporting jobs in the primary processing of agricultural and forestry products, in haulage and in the local community infrastructure which are not readily quantifiable.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many people at the latest available date been registered as unemployed in the Greenock travel-to-work area who are (a) aged under 24 years, (b) 25 to 40 years and (c) 41 to 60 years;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the number of (a) men and (b) women who have been unemployed for each of the last five years in the Greenock travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter to him of 22 October. Current information is available by age and sex for the former Greenock travel-to-work area and (from June 1983) for the revised Greenock and Port Glasgow travel-to-work area, and may be obtained from the House of Commons Library. The change in October 1982 from a registrant to a claimant based count affects the comparability of the data for the former Greenock travel-to-work area over the five years.

Licensing Hours

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will have completed his review of the Scottish experience following the introduction of flexible liquor licensing hours.

Mr. Ancram: As my right hon. Friend announced in the House on 27 March at column 141 a survey is being conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys to assess the present public attitudes to the liquor licensing law. The results of the survey are expected next summer and we shall then consider what, if any, action should follow on the survey report.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of Forestry Commission felling operations are carried out by local labour; and what proportion of felling and planting operations are put to competitive tender.

Mr. John MacKay: Approximately eighty per cent. of the Forestry Commission's felling operations are carried out by local labour.

About 20 per cent. of felling operations and 1 per cent. of planting operations are put out to competitive tender.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the recent financial returns achieved by the Forestry Commission on its planting operations carried out since 1920.

Mr. John MacKay: From 1 April 1972 the Commission has been set a target rate of return for forestry of 3 per cent. in real terms. At five-yearly intervals the assets are revalued and performance is measured against that target rate for the preceding five-year period.

The first five-year period ended on 31 March 1977 and the performance achieved within that period represented an overall return of 3·1 per cent. in real terms when expressed as a return over the whole rotation.

The second five-year period ended on 31 March 1982. The performance achieved within that period represented an overall return of 2·6 per cent. in real terms.

With only two years of the current five-year period completed the indications are that the target rate of return of 3 per cent. will be exceeded.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much Forestry Commission land has been sold on a sale and leaseback arrangement; and if he is satisfied with this method of disposal.

Mr. John MacKay: Except in the case of one small property, this method of sale has failed to attract any serious interest and it has ceased to be used.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from trade unions concerning piecemeal disposal of Forestry Commission land; and whether he has any plans to privatise the operation as a whole.

Mr. John MacKay: A number of such representations have been received.

The policy relating to the disposal of land managed by the Forestry Commission was set out by my right hon. Friend on 8 November 1984 in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) at column 6.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning the environmental input of the Forestry Commission activities in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations over the last year or two on environmental aspects of the Commission's activities in Scotland. Most of these representations related to specific planting or felling proposals by private owners involving the Commission as the Department responsible for administering the felling licensing regulations and the forestry grant scheme. There were also representations relating to the Commission's own activities, mainly on the possible impact on the environment of certain sales of land.

Western Isles (Development)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much of the funds from the integrated development programme for the Western Isles has been allocated to date for agriculture and fish farming, respectively.

Mr. Younger: As at 31 October 1984, public expenditure of approximately £6½ million and £1½ million had been incurred respectively under the agriculture and fish farming sections of the Western Isles integrated development programme.

Prestwick Freeport (Grants)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the effect on the eligibility for grants of firms setting up in the Prestwick freeport of the recent changes relating to assisted areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Prestwick freeport is situated in the Ayr travel-to-work area which is an intermediate area on the new assisted area map. Firms throughout the TTWA will continue to have access to regional selective assistance on projects which create or safeguard jobs. In addition, firms within the area of the Ayr TTWA as defined before 27 September 1984 (which included the freeport) can continue to claim regional development grant, on the terms of the scheme then in force, on new assets provided up to 28 November 1985.

Republic of Ireland (Extradition Warrants)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of warrants for extradition, in connection with terrorist offences, which have been issued to the authorities in the Republic of Ireland by police forces in Scotland for which the person named therein has not yet been extradited.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have been asked to reply.

There are two cases — that of David Michael Dinsmore this year and the case of Bartholomew Burns in 1973—in which warrants have been issued by Scottish Courts in connection with offences connected with terrorism and passed to the authorities in the Republic of Ireland for extradition by police forces in Scotland for which the person named therein has not yet been extradited.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Swann Committee

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next expects to meet members of the Swann committee; and when he hopes their report on the education of children from ethnic minorities will be concluded.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is to meet members of the Swann committee socially after their next meeting on 12 December. I understand that the committee hopes to present its final report to my right hon. Friend soon after that.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current average pupil-teacher ratio in both primary and secondary schools for the West Midlands county; and how this compares with the same ratio level during the last three school years.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios within maintained primary and secondary schools in the metropolitan districts of the West Midlands county in the years 1981 to 1984 are as follows:

	Primary	Secondary
1981	22·6	16·1
1982	22·5	16·3
1983	22·6	16·4
1984	22·1	15·9

Student Awards

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give a breakdown by education authority of the total amounts paid out in each of the last five years for which figures are available on (a) mandatory maintenance awards and (b) discretionary maintenance awards.

Mr. Brooke: The information is not readily available on an individual local authority basis. Total such expenditure in England and Wales was as follows:

*Local authority expenditure in full-value awards

	Mandatory £ million	Discretionary £ million
1978-79	271·9	43·5
1979-80	332·2	49·5
1980-81	398·1	52·9
1981-82	443·3	55·2
1982-83	472·0	59·0

* Excluding expenditure on fees.

Numbers of students receiving such awards by LEA are however given in Statistical Bulletin 3/84, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in receipt of mandatory maintenance awards received only the minimum grant in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: Information on mandatory award-holders alone is not available. The number of all full value maintenance award-holders receiving a minimum award in each of the last five years was as follows:

	Number
1978-79	25,143
1979-80	28,402
1980-81	30,648
1981-82	39,391
1982-83	47,520

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the total annual amount of assessed parental contribution towards student maintenance grants in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: The amount of assessed parental contribution in respect of mandatory awards is as follows:

1978-79	89
1979-80	84
1980-81	98
1982-83	155

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in receipt of mandatory maintenance grants were assessed for nil parental contribution in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: The following information relates to the number of full-value mandatory and discretionary award-holders in England and Wales. Information in respect of mandatory award-holders alone is not available.

Numbers of students assessed for nil parental contribution

	Thousands
1978-79	93·2
1979-80	105·6
1980-81	113·1

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the percentage of parents' income after tax and national insurance which would be required for parental contributions to student maintenance and tuition fees in 1985-86 assuming existing rates, and publish a table showing the effects for incomes of £14,000 to £50,000 per annum before allowing for fixed commitments such as mortgage payments and so on.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on 23 November at columns 341-42. The table extends the previous table to cover gross income up to £50,000:

Notes:

The contribution payable in each case may be less than the amounts shown in the scale, particularly at its top end. This will depend on the amount of the award (maintenance and fees) towards which the contribution has to be made and whether any of the assessed contribution is offset by allowances for other dependent children.

Families with one award-holder studying outside London and with no other dependent children will be assessed to contribute on average no more than £2,412.

In 1985-86 there will be a maximum parental contribution of £4,000 per family.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he made of salary increases in calculating that 10,000 families will be relieved of the need to contribute towards student grants.

Mr. Brooke: Some 10,000 families who would otherwise have been assessed for a contribution towards the student grant next year will not be so assessed as a result of the indexation of the threshold of the parental contribution scale by around 7 per cent.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the numbers of students in receipt of a maximum grant, part grant and minimum grant, respectively, for each of the last five years for which figures are available, expressing these numbers in percentage terms.

Mr. Brooke: The information for England and Wales was as follows:

	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83
Numbers of students (000's):
Receiving a maximum full-value award	132·2	143·9	151·9	159·2	152·4
Percentage of total	35·8	39·0	40·0	39·9	36·6
Receiving only a part of a full-value award	211·9	197·0	196·9	200·7	216·1
Percentage of total	57·4	53·3	51·9	50·3	51·9
Receiving a minimum award	25·1	28·4	30·6	39·4	47·5
Percentage of total	6·8	7·7	8·1	9·9	11·4
All students with mandatory and discretionary full value awards	369·2	369·4	379·4	399·3	416·0
Percentage of total	100	100	100	100	100

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the numbers of students for each of the last three years who have become eligible for maximum grant because of increases in the threshold for parental contributions.

Mr. Brooke: In 1982-83 the threshold for parental contributions was held constant at £6,600 and 15,000 to 20,000 additional families were assessed for parental contribution. In 1983-84 and 1984-85 the threshold has been raised in line with the rise in average parental incomes and the proportion of dependent students eligible for a maximum award has therefore remained broadly the same as that in 1982-83.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, before rejecting proposals for a student partial loan scheme, he considered possible means of funding such a scheme from the private sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: A number of options for the possible replacement of all or part of the grant by a loan, including a private sector scheme, have been considered by Ministers. The Government have at present no intention of replacing any part of the student grant by a loan.

Any reform of the student support system, whether or not involving loans, would be introduced only after wide consultation.

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will show the parental contribution payable in 1985-86 at residual incomes of £8,000 and £50,000 for maintenance and tuition fees for one student at a provincial university.

Mr. Brooke: The parental contributions are as follows:

Residual Income	Assessed Parental Contribution
8,000	–
9,000	148
10,000	291
12,000	674
14,000	1,074
16,000	1,524
18,000	2,024

Residual Income	Assessed Parental Contribution
20,000	*2,345
30,000	2,345
50,000	2,345

* Equivalent to the elsewhere rate of student grant plus the designated fee of £520. In the case of families with more than one student, the assessed parental contribution will rise incrementally at a rate of £1 for every £4 of residual income to a maximum of £4,000 per family (at a residual income of £25,904).

Higher Education (Ethnic Background)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has collected on the effects of ethnic background on demand for higher education.

Mr. Brooke: The Department has carried out some analysis of the relationship between ethnic background and educational achievement. Some information about the destination of school-leavers from different ethnic groups was published in June 1981 in the interim of the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups (Cmnd. 8273). I understand that Lord Swann hopes to submit the Committee's final report in the near future.

Teachers

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to increase the number of teachers.

Mr. Dunn: In view of the continuing fall in pupil numbers, the Government's expenditure plans envisage a reduction in the number of teachers employed by local education authorities in England next year. The Department's paper "Schoolteacher Numbers and Deployment in the Longer Term" discusses the prospects for the next decade. I am sending a copy to my hon. Friend.

Primary School (Saltley)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he needs any information from the city of Birmingham education department, in order to take a decision on the proposal to open a new primary school at Leigh road, Saltley.

Mr. Dunn: No.

EMPLOYMENT

Disablement Resettlement Officers

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many disablement resettlement officers there have been in each of the last five years; and what were their client numbers and placement records during the same period.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Number of Disablement Resettlement Officers	Client Numbers		Placings
		Caseload at end of year	Joining caseload during year
1979-80	Around 520 to 530	152,792	191,986	59,736
1980-81	Around 520 to 530	185,283	196,174	39,468
1981-82	Around 520 to 530	203,210	171,844	35,470
1982-83	Around 520 to 530	198,749	135,230	35,591
1983-84	Around 450	29,419	58,854	27,749

Changes in the figures reflect the reorganisation of employment services for disabled people which were introduced progressively in 1983-84, and the removal in October 1982 of the requirement to register for employment at jobcentres in order to claim unemployment and allied benefits. Figures from October 1982 therefore relate only to disabled people who choose to register for work at jobcentres and are not directly comparable with those for earlier years.

The figures client numbers and placings in 1983-84 do not include those disabled people helped by the general employment services in jobcentres.

Training

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on progress towards recognised standards of competence in adult training in line with the objectives of the new training initiative, and on the role of the Skillcentre Training Agency in this.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984]: Significant progress towards standards-based training is being made in most sectors of the economy and this applies both to the initial training of young people and to adults. In June 1984 the Manpower Services Commission published a position statement which identified the need for greater effort to be made to open up access to jobs and to training, to ensure that training is relevant and cost-effective and to develop and improve systems of assessment and certification. The Government endorse these objectives which the Commission is carrying forward in concert with industry training organisations and standard-setting bodies.

The Skillcentre Training Agency liaises with industry and examining bodies to ensure that its courses include tests of competence to the latest standards. Industrial to Parliament in the normal way, as a Command paper, together with all the related documents, and the necessary steps will then be taken with a view to ratification.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Soley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the following information in relation to the mining dispute: (i) the number of arrests in each police force area; and (ii) the number of those arrested who were released without being charged.

Mr. Ancram: I have been asked to reply.

The information held centrally, which relates to the period to 16 November, is set out below:

Police Force area	Number of arrests	Number of persons arrested and released without charge
Central Scotland	7	4
Dumfries and Galloway	3	—
Fife	199	—
Lothian and Borders	432	6
Strathclyde	688	9
Total	1,342	19

Mr. Soley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the following information in relation to the mining dispute: (i) the number of police sent out of each police force area for duty in connection with the dispute during each week of the dispute; and (ii) the number of police injured in each police force area; how many of these were seriously injured; and how many were treated in hospital other than as outpatients.

Mr. Ancram: I have been asked to reply.

Three Scottish police forces have had occasion to deploy officers outwith their areas in connection with the current dispute in the mining industry. The occasions and numbers of officers involved are shown in Table 1 below. Generally the deployments have been for only very limited periods during the weeks in question.

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Pay)

65. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will be in a position to take a decision on the setting up of an unrestricted independent review body to set the salary scales for all grades of the teaching profession.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him of 9 November 1984 at c. 11.

Hyperbaric Oxygen

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the centres in hospitals in Scotland where hyperbaric oxygen for the effective treatment of carbon monoxide intoxication is available.

Mr. John MacKay: There are National Health Service hyperbaric oxygen facilities at the Western infirmary, Glasgow, and at Dyce airport, Aberdeen. These facilities are available to clinicians for the treatment of patients suffering from carbon-monoxide poisoning.

Blind Persons

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what special steps he will take to ensure that unemployed blind people, wishing to begin a business venture with the support of the enterprise allowance scheme but who are unable to read the literature provided, understand that they must not make attempts to start their businesses before they apply.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Blind persons seeking information about the enterprise allowance scheme are given a full explanation of its aims and conditions by jobcentre staff, assisted as necessary by one of the commission's blind persons resettlement officers. Written information about the Scheme is, of course, available for use by sighted friends or relatives.

Forest Land (Sales)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total area and value of forest land sold or in the process of being sold since the passing of the Forestry Act 1981; and whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of all such properties and the selling price in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: Between the passing of the Forestry Act 1981 and 21 October 1984—the latest date for which information is available—a total of £57·3 million was received from the sale of Forestry Commission land and other real assets. The area involved included 37,299 hectares of forestry land and plantations. As at 21 October 1984 a further £32·9 million worth of land and other real assets, including 33,743 hectares of forestry land and plantations, were in the process of being sold—that is they were either on the market or had been approved for sale and reserve prices had been fixed.

Lists of forest areas which had been sold up to 21 June 1984, or which were in the process of being sold at that date, were provided on 25 July 1984 in the answer I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) at c. 665-83. List of forest areas sold between 22 June 1984 and 21 October 1984, or which were in the process of being sold at 21 October 1984.

As regards publication of the selling prices of individual properties I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 28 November 1984, at c. 494.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women have been searched when visiting Her Majesty's prison, Walton, in each of the past three years; and what were the findings of such searches.

Mr. Mellor: Information about the number of women searched is not available, and the results of searches are not recorded by reference to the sex of the visitor concerned.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Brittan: For 1983-84 it is estimated that about 0·01 per cent. of Home Office running costs was attributable to duties which had to be carried out as a result of membership of the European Communities.

Elections (Statistics)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a list in the Official Report showing the percentage of the poll in each constituency at the last general election, indicating the six polling stations which had the highest and the six polling stations which had the lowest percentage polls and the constituencies in whicy they are situated.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list for the last general election which six constituencies in England had the highest and which six constituencies had the lowest percentage poll; which six polling stations in England had the highest and which six polling stations had the lowest percentage poll; what those percentages were; and, in the case of the polling stations, in which constituencies they were situated;

(2) if he will list for the last general election which six constituencies in Wales had the highest and which six constituencies had the lowest percentage poll; which six polling stations had the highest and which six had the lowest percentage poll; what those percentages were; and, in the case of the polling stations, in which constituencies they were situated;

(3) if he will list for the last general election which six constituencies in Scotland had the highest and which six constituencies had the lowest percentage poll; which six polling stations had the highest and which six polling stations had the lowest percentage poll; what those percentages were; and, in the case of the polling stations, in which constituencies they were situated.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

Information for the 1983 parliamentary general election on the number of valid votes counted as a percentage of the number of electors in each constituency is given in table 4 of "Election Expenses" (House of Commons Paper 130). Corresponding information for polling stations is not collected centrally.

Rape and Sexual Assault

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many cases of rape and sexual assault have been reported to the police for each of the last five years; and of these, how many cases reported have led to prosecutions;

(2) how many prosecutions for rape and sexual assault have resulted in (a) convictions and (b) acquittals in each of the last five years;

(3) what type of sentence has been passed on those persons convicted of rape and sexual assault in each of the last three years.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" including the supplementary tables: for notable offences recorded by the police in table 2.9 of the volume for 1983 (Cmnd. 9349): for prosecutions, convictions and sentences in table Sr j 1-101.1(A) of vol. 1 and table 2.1(A) of vol. 2 of the supplementary tables for 1983 and in the corresponding tables in the volumes for earlier years. The figures for rape include some offences other than under section 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, including offences of aiding and abetting and attempts.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Oxford and Cambridge University (Entrance Statistics)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many advanced level secondary school pupils applied for and obtained a place at either Oxford or Cambridge university for the 1984-85 academic year; and how these numbers compare with the four previous academic years.

Mr. Brooke: The number of United Kingdom candidates applying for and obtaining a place at Oxford and Cambridge universities in each of the last five years was as follows:

	Applicants	Acceptances
1984-85	14,026	5,484
1983-84	14,359	5,334
1982-83	14,244	5,357
1981-82	13,563	5,464
1980-81	13,580	5,552

The numbers include a small number of students from further education colleges as well as school pupils.

The numbers of acceptances include a few conditional acceptances at Oxford, a small proportion of whom fail to meet the required conditions.

Student Awards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he now has for putting into effect the partial loans scheme.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have at present no intention of replacing any part of the student grant by a loan.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is his intention to uprate the residual income thresholds for parental contributions to student grant in line with prices, earnings or some other measure.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 14 November 1984 at columns 238-39.

VAT (Books and Periodicals)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the extra cost to local education authorities if value added tax is charged on books and periodicals.

Mr. Dunn: The application of VAT to books and periodicals would not result in any increase in their expenditure since local education authorities are able to reclaim VAT paid on goods and services in respect of their non-trading activities.

Higher Education (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his response to the proposals made in the report entitled "Britain's Future: the Economy and Higher Education," published by the National Association of Teachers of Further and Higher Education, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what recommendations he will be issuing arising from that report.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend welcomes the document's recognition of the importance of higher education for the development of the economy, but regrets that it does not show equal recognition of the importance for the economy of containing the growth in public spending. He is currently considering the future development of higher education generally in the light of the advice he has received from the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education, and plans to bring forward his proposals early next year.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Sir Keith Joseph: About 0·3 per cent.

Overseas Students (Fees)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the increases made by the Government in fees for overseas students; and what recent representations he has received on the matter.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend sets maximum fees only for overseas students who began their courses before 1 September 1980, who are excluded from the effects of the Government's policy that overseas students should pay fees that cover the cost of their education. He announced new maximum fee levels for such students in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) on 21 February this year. My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations on those fees. For other overseas students, institutions and local education authorities are free to determine the fee to be charged in accordance with the Government's policy and in the light of their own circumstances.

Science Budget

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has yet received the advice of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on the allocation of the science budget for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes. I received the board's advice last Friday and am publishing it today. Copies are available in the Library. I expect to inform the board of my conclusions very soon.

Essex

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent, per child, in real terms in each of the last five years in primary and secondary schools in Essex on (a) books, (b) equipment and (c) maintenance and repair, compared with the average for the non-metropolitan counties.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 355]: The average expenditure per pupil in real terms, on books, equipment and maintenance and repairs in each of the five years to 1982-83, the latest year for which firm figures are available, are set out in the following table. The combined figures for primary and secondary schools are given.

Per pupil expenditure (£' 1982-83 prices)

Financial Year	Books		Equipment		Repairs and Maintenance
	Essex	Non-Met. counties	Essex	Non-Met. counties	Essex	Non-Met. counties
	£	£	£	£	£	£
1978-79	7	8	19	19	32	35
1979-80	7	8	19	18	35	36
1980-81	7	7	16	17	39	39
1981-82	6	8	15	17	33	36
1982-83	7	8	18	19	44	41

The 1982-83 prices have been calculated using the Publishers' Association school books index for books, the RPI, all items except food index for equipment and the local authorities' non-teaching cost index for maintenance and repairs.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the real value of the capitation allowances in the primary and secondary schools in Essex for each of the last five years, compared with the average for the non-metropolitan counties.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 355]: The information requested is not available. No central record is kept of capitation allowances.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent in real terms in each of the last five years on each child attending primary and secondary schools in Essex, compared with the average for the non-metropolitan counties.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 355]: The average net institutional recurrent expenditure per pupil in real terms in each of the five years to 1982-83, the latest year for which firm figures are available, are set out in the table. The combined figures for primary and secondary schools are given.

Net Institutional Recurrent Expenditure per Pupil (1982-83 prices)

WALES

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what he estimates has been the cost to date to the Welsh economy of the mining dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: It is not possible at this stage to make detailed estimates of the cost of the strike as suggested, but in his Autumn Statement of 12 November in columns. 415-429 my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave an indication of the effects of the public sector borrowing requirements for the country as a whole.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: For 1983-84 approximately 3 per cent. of the running costs of the Department are directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Vosper Thornycroft Ship Repairers Ltd.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the conditions appertaining to the offer of sale by British Shipbuilders of Vosper Thornycroft Ship Repairers Ltd., in respect of the subsequent maintenance of the business of shiprepairing and of the various sites.

Mr. Butcher: I have asked British Shipbuilders to ascertain the intentions of the prospective purchasers and I hope that it will be possible for them to sell the company as a shiprepairer. However, British Shipbuilders is not seeking to impose a formal condition to this effect.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Yorkshire Water Authority

Sir Michael Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the Yorkshire water authority will be published.

Mr. Fletcher: The report is published today. The commission was asked to report on the efficiency and costs of, and the service provided by, the Yorkshire water authority.

The authority was reconstituted on 1 October 1983 as a result of the Water Act 1983 and a new chairman and board appointed. The commission note organisational and structural changes since put in hand and commends the effect which these, combined with the setting of challenging performance targets, are having in improving efficiency.

The commission identifies scope for further improvement, for example in the need for the authority to develop a structured approach to the assessment of manpower needs, but recognises that the Authority is making great efforts to improve its efficiency and effectiveness by implementing a wide range of management techniques.

The commission has indicated which of its suggestions for improvements should have priority.

The commission notes the extent to which there is a need to improve the standards of service to acceptable levels particularly in relation to water supply and sewerage. It suggests that the time has now come for the authority to work towards a more transparent link between levels of efficiency, minimum acceptable standards of service and future performance aims.

The commission was asked how changes in quality of service would affect costs and the report includes illustrative calculations. The Commission noted that the authority saw such studies as beneficial in assessing priorities and relating its decisions to customers' views on the costs of improvements in services.

Finally, the commission was asked to consider whether the authority is pursuing a course of conduct which operates against the public interest. It concludes that it is not.

The authority will be publishing its preliminary response to the commission's findings within three to four months, in the light of which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will make a statement.

Citizens Advice Bureaux

38. Mr. George Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will detail the level of grant in aid made available to the Scottish Citizens Advice Bureaux for each of the last five financial years, as well as for the current financial year; and if he will indicate the criterion he uses to determine the level of grant in aid.

Mr. Fletcher: The total grant in aid paid to the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux since 1979-80 is as follows:

1979-80	228,384
1980-81	415,200
1981-82	503,733
1982-83	530,608
1983-84	629,700

In the current financial year, the cash limit is £700,400.

The grant in aid is determined on the basis of an analysis of needs considered within the framework of public expenditure constraints.

39. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what funds he is making available to citizens advice bureaux in Scotland over the next two years.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is not yet available. Expenditure plans for 1985-86 and 1986-87 have not yet been laid before Parliament and the exact amount of grant to individual organisations has yet to be decided.

Pharmaceutical Exports

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to seek powers to tighten controls on the export of pharmaceutical products by British-based companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

Apart from certain biological products, there are no statutory controls over the export of pharmaceutical products by British-based companies. For those countries which require it the Government will certify the licensing status in the United Kingdom of exported medicinal products and their source of manufacture, in accordance with World Health Organisation guidelines. We have no plans to alter these arrangements, but we shall continue to offer as much information as possible about the licensing and pricing of drugs in the United Kingdom to those overseas Governments who request it.

EMPLOYMENT

Wage Trends

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what have been the trends in wages paid since 1979 to young men and young women, respectively; and what has been the trend in unemployment for these categories over the same period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Figures of the average gross weekly earnings of full-time male and female employees working a full week and aged under 18 years are published regularly for each April in tables 10 and 11 of the report, "New Earnings Survey", part A. Copies of the reports from 1979 to 1984 inclusive are available in the Library.

Information on unemployment analysed by age and sex is also available in the Library. However, current figures cannot be compared directly with those for 1979 mainly because of the change from the registrant-based to the claimant-based unemployment count in October 1982.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The proportion is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Service (Performance-related Pay)

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action is being taken to introduce performance-related pay in the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The programme of action I announced in July last year was directed at the improvement of the general quality of personnel management in the Civil Service as part of the Government's overall policy for improved management efficiency, and the achievement of better value for money by all civil servants. The introduction of performance-related pay was an important task under this programme.

The Government believe it right to provide additional incentives to good performance. This becomes more important in a contracting organisation, where there are reduced opportunities for promotion, which hitherto has been the main means of giving recognition to good performance. Performance-related pay is widely recognised as a valuable management tool and has been recommended to the Civil Service on a number of occasions.

At the same time, the successful introduction of this kind of arrangement into an organisation as large and complex as the Civil Service would be a major operation carrying with it significant changes in the functions of managers and their relationships with their staff. There are choices to be made about the form of a performance-related pay scheme, as well as about its administration and the systems and procedures needed for that purpose. Cost is also an important factor.

For all these reasons, performance-related pay cannot be introduced immediately across the whole of the Civil Service. But the Government consider it important that some steps should be taken. They therefore think it right to introduce with effect from April 1985 an experimental scheme under which staff at the grading levels of Grade 3 (Under Secretary) down to Principal and equivalent grades will have the opportunity to earn a bonus for particularly good performance. The experiment will last for three years and its operation will be carefully monitored. A total of £4 million is being made available to fund this initial experimental scheme in each of the three

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The population of each health district presents its own characteristics and our opinion is that local needs rather than any kind of national norms should be the relevant consideration in establishing what is the appropriate level of service for any district.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give his Department's best estimate of the shortfall in the number of (a) physiotherapists, (b) occupational therapists and (c) therapists available for the treatment of the population aged 65 years or over; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are examining intitial material from surveys being carried out which suggests that the shortfall in (a) and (b) may be of the order of 4 per cent. and 15 per cent. respectively. So far as (c) is concerned, I would refer the hon. Member to my answer to his other questions today.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many post offices have been distributed with new order book covers in the light of the dispute involving computer staff of his Department; and how many computer tapes covering automatic credit transfers have been run since the commencement of the dispute of the Newcastle computer centre.

Mr. Newton: The distribution of new order book covers showing the new benefit rates in respect of the 7 million retirement pensioners and over 3 million recipients of child benefits to all post offices has been completed. The remaining child benefit recipients have already received order books showing the new rates. The normal arrangements for payment to pensioners by credit transfer resumed on 23 November and payment of the new benefit rates will be included with the appropriate regular payment. The arrangements for payment of child benefit by credit transfer have continued to operate throughout the dispute.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services at what amount the £10 Christmas bonus for retirement pensioners and others should be set to keep it in line with inflation since its introduction.

Mr. Whitney: The Christmas bonus was introduced in 1972 but was not paid by the previous Administration in 1975 and 1976. To restore the value at which it was introduced in 1972, it would need to be increased to £40. To restore the value at which it was re-introduced in 1977, it would need to be increased to £19.

Heating Allowances

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has sent to Age Concern in answer to its recent letter to him about the real effects of pension rises against the reduction in the level of allocations of heating allowances.

Mr. Newton: I wrote to the director of Age Concern today and I have placed a copy of my letter in the Library.

Medical Negligence

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new measures he proposes to expedite compensation payments to patients arising from medical negligence or to bereaved relations or dependants in the case of a deceased patient; and if he is satisfied that the current levels of compensation payments allocated to such patients are adequate.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities are responsible for handling legal claims for compensation. In our guidance on the release of information in legal cases we urge authorities to be as helpful as possible. I would hope that no health authority would cause needless delay in resolving a claim. Levels of compensation are for the courts to decide in the light of the particular circumstances of a case or for the parties concerned to agree between themselves.

NHS (Managers)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which section of which Act of Parliament gives him the power to confirm or refuse to confirm the appointments of a general manager by a regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The powers of the Secretary of State in respect of the appointment of health authority staff are those conferred by paragraph 10 of schedule 5 to the NHS Act 1977.

Our guidance circular on the appointment of general managers asks regional health authorities to submit their proposals for identifying a general manager to the Secretary of State for discussion with the regional health authority chairman to confirm that the Secretary of State is content, before the authority proceeds to a formal decision.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many striking miners are drawing sick pay.

Mr. Newton: I regret that this information is not available.

Drugs (Side Effects)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many persons, male and female, were admitted to hospital in the United Kingdom for treatment for the side effects of drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, and 1983;

(2) what was the nature of the side effects for which people were admitted to hospital in the United Kingdom resulting from the taking of prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine groups in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 November, c. 49]: We do not collect the detailed information requested on hospital admissions centrally. The side effects and adverse reactions associated with benzodiazepines are well known and described in the data sheets for prescribers prepared by the manufacturers. They rarely give rise to the need for hospital admission unless an overdose has been taken.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his Department will publish the results of research sponsored by it into the side effects of taking drugs in the benzodiazepine group.

(2) what research has been sponsored by his Department into the side effects of prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 November, c. 49]: The Government support research into this topic through the Medical Research Council, the Government-funded body supported mainly under a grant-in-aid from the science Vote of the Department of Education and Science.

The council has informed us that the total costs of the projects listed below which it has supported during the four financial years have been:

1980-81	332,000
1981-82	389,000
1982-83	336,000
1983-84	404,000

The projects, by chronological order of starting date within these four financial years (with finishing dates where they are no longer being supported) are as follows:

Department of Pharmacology, University of Oxford
Chronic effects of centrally active drugs and their metabolites on brain chemistry and structure including gas — phase chromatography—mass spectroscopy. Started 1 November 1972, finished 1 December 1983.

Institute of Psychiatry, London
Psychophysiological and Biochemical measures in the assessment of Psychotropic drug effects. Started 1 April 1976.

University of Wales, College of Medicine, Cardiff
Investigation of improved methods of treatment and biochemical factors in affective disorders. Started 1 April 1976.

MRC Clinical Pharmacology Unit, Oxford
Development of methods for monitoring drug therapy in individual patients: Psychotropic drugs. Started 1 April 1976, finished 31 March 1982.

Department of Pharmacology, School of Pharmacy, London
An alternative approach for the manipulation of Gaba activity in the brain. Started 1 January 1980, finished 31 December 1982.

Clinical Research Centre, Harrow, Middlesex
Clinical studies of Psychotropic drugs: modes of action and physiological and biochemical correlates. Started 1 April 1980.

MRC Brain Metabolism Unit, Edinburgh
Cellular and clinical studies of effective disorders. Started 1 April 1980, finished 31 March 1982.

Department of Pharmacology, University of Bristol
Behavioural and biochemical investigations on the mode of action of benzodiazepines and their long term effects. Started 1 January 1981, finished 31 December 1983.

MRC Clinical Pharmacology Unit, Oxford
Clinical studies of the mechanisms of action of ECT, Antidepressent drugs and new drugs for depression and anxiety. Started 1 April 1982.

Department of Physiology, University of Oxford
Behavioural, Electrophysiological and Neurochemical effects of anxiolytic and anti-depressent treatments. Started 1 April 1982.

Department of Pharmacology, University of Oxford
Mechanisms involved in toxicity and in the development of tolerance shown by centrally active drugs. Started 1 October 1982, finished 30 September 1984.

Department of Pharmacology, Institute of Psychiatry, London
Behavioural pharmacology of the benzodiazepine receptor complex. Started 4 October 1982.

Department of Pharmacology, Institute of Psychiatry, London
Psychometric performance and neuroradiological measures in long term benzodiazepine users. Started 1 January 1983.

MRC Clinical Pharmacology Unit, Oxford
Clinical biochemical pharmacology of depression and anxiety. Started 1 April 1983.

Department of Psychology, Birkbeck College, London
An investigation of the role of brain gaba in the anti-anxiety effects of benzodiazepines. Started 3 October 1983.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many unoccupied hospital beds there were in England in 1983.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 27 November, c. 472]: In 1983 there was a daily average of 66,660 beds recorded as being available but not occupied in National Health Service hospitals in England. Bed occupancy figures are based on a midnight count and do not threfore reflect the use of beds by patients who do not stay overnight, for example, day surgery cases whose numbers have increased from 432,000 in 1978 to 581,000 in 1983.

A variety of reasons may lead to some beds being unoccupied. These include the need to have beds available for emergencies, unexpectedly early discharges which leave a bed available until the next day and unpredictable admissions (eg, in maternity cases).

The health services information steering group recommended in its first report that bed use data should include all patients using a ward in a 24-hour period and that aggregated bed occupancy statistics should not be used as an indicator of efficient bed use. A more useful measure of bed utilisation is patient throughput per available bed. For instance, in 1983 17·5 in-patient cases were treated per available bed compared with 14·5 in 1978.

NHS (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the standard of provision of ancillary services in the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 29 November, c. 576]: I am satisfied with the general standard of these services although there are no doubt occasions, in an organisation as large as the National Health Service, when they fall below the high standard required. Our policy of competitive tendering will help to ensure that these services are provided as efficiently and economically as possible, whilst maintaining standards, which are specified in tender documents.

Perinatal Deaths

Mrs. Renée short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what change there has been in the perinatal mortality rate in the west midlands in social classes III, IV and V since 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 30 November, c. 624]: The available information is given in the table, but it should be noted that analyses of perinatal mortality by social class within a region are based on a small number of events in the overall sample and can therefore produce large random variations in the figures over one or two years. The total rate of perinatal mortality in the region over a longer period (1979-1983) fell by 27 per cent, only a little less than the figure of 29 per cent. for England as a whole. The regional health authority, in its outline strategic plan, has given a high priority to the further reduction of perinatal mortality locally.

West Midlands. Perinatal Mortality: Rate per 1000 Total Births.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Customs and Excise

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise management plan 1984-85, how many officers are engaged full-time in dealing with restrictions or controls over dangerous drugs, firearms, explosives and indecent and obscene articles; if such officers are organised in special units; and what is the management structure.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise staff engaged full-time on customs preventive and non-revenue fraud work at 31 March 1984 was 3,060. These duties include dealing with restrictions or controls over dangerous drugs, firearms, explosives and indecent and obscene articles.

Many of these staff are deployed at ports, airports and inland clearance depots where thay operate both static and flexible controls and also man intelligence gathering teams. There are also mobile task forces and mobile rummage crews available to enhance these controls and participate in targetted operations. Coastal waters are patrolled by revenue cutters, often working in conjunction with land based mobile forces. 339 staff were engaged at 31 March 1984 on non-revenue fraud work. This included 201 (since increased to 212) specialist drugs investigators working in special teams.

The management structure is headed by two headquarters directorates—customs and outfield, who cover questions relating to policy and management of resources—but operational control is delegated to 22 regional collectors, within whose areas of responsibility the maximum use is made of flexible deployment to match the needs of the work.

In 1984-85, and extra 60 posts have been allocated to enhance preventive controls of passengers and freight. A further increase of 100 posts for the fight against drugs smuggling is planned for 1985-86.

Nationalised Industries (Return on Capital)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the return on capital (a) in each of the nationalised industries and (b) in all other commercial state concerns; and what is the total capital involved in each case.

Mr. Peter Rees: It is not possible to provide information for each nationalised industry on a comparable basis. Available figures are as follows:

Rates of Return on Capital Employed 1983—National Accounts Basis

Industry	Capital Stock £ billion	Rates of Return
		Including subsidy per cent.	Excluding subsidy per cent.
Air Support Services (BAA; CAA)	1·2	7·4	7·2
Air Transport (BA)	1·3	6·9	6·9
Other Inland Transport (NBC; STG; LRT)	3·6	−2·0	−18·7
Posts and Telecom (PO; BT)	19·4	3·8	3·8
Rail (British Railway Board)	13·8	−1·5	−8·5
Shipbuilding (British Shipbuilders)	1·2	−11·6	−13·0
Steel (BSC)	9·0	−9·2	−9·2
Public Corporations (other than nationalised industries)	12·2	4·6	0·7

1983 rates of return for industries in the standard industrial classification division 1 (the energy and water supply industries) are not yet available as the assumptions underlying the rates, in particular asset lives, are at present under review by the CSO.

The basis for the calculation of the figures, which relate to all the public corporations in particular standard industrial classifications, was set out in the Treasury evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in 1981 (published as appendix 12 of volume III of its report "Financing of the Nationalised Industries" HC 348-III). The rates of return given are based on national accounts statistics and, therefore, differ from figures based on nationalised industries' published accounts.

Pensions

Mr. Murphy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultation he is planning to have regarding taxation of pensions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have no such plans.

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the extra cost to an employer in percentage terms if a pension fund was taxed on investment income and capital gains where benefits remain the same for existing and future pensioners.

Mr. Moore: For a particular pension fund, any additional cost would depend upon the rate of tax and the circumstances of the fund. These would include the nature of the assets held by the fund and the extent of the fund's liabilities to current pensioners and serving members. I regret that it is not possible to provide a general answer.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of registered blind people employed by Her Majesty's Treasury at 1 June in each of the last four years was:

	Number
1 June 1981	1
1 June 1982	4
1 June 1983	4
1 June 1984	3

European Communities (Supplementary Finance)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take in relation to the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (Undertaking on Supplementary Finance for the Community) Order following the High Court decision by Mr. Justice Hodgson on 28 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government are still considering their response to the action brought by Mr. O. Smedley. There is no question of rushing the section 1(3) Order through the House. The Government have made it clear throughout that they would not ask the House to approve the intergovernmental agreement until the European Community Council of Ministers has finally adopted the text on budgetary discipline. That has not yet been done; the question of budgetary discipline is on the agenda of the European Council this week. The House will have a full opportunity to debate the intergovernmental agreement and to vote before any money is paid to the Community.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he tabled the order providing for supplementary funds for the Common Market before an agreement had been reached on budgetary restraint.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The draft Order was tabled in good time, so as to provide full opportunity for considering it. The Government repeatedly made it clear that Parliament would not be asked to approve implementation of the intergovernmental agreement for supplementary funds for 1984 before effective measures on budgetary discipline have been adopted.

Mortgages

Mr. Craigen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the estimated number of mortgagors with mortgages of £15,000, £20,000, £25,000 and £30,000, respectively, in 1984-85 in each tax band.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to the reply, 20 November, c. 96]: The latest estimates are as follows:

	Thousands of mortgagors
	Range of mortgage outstanding
*Marginal tax rate	Under £15,000	£15,000 -£19,999	£20,000 -£24,999	£25,000 -£29,999	£30,000 and over	Total
30 per cent.	4,490	820	580	310	290	6,490

Customs and Excise (Confiscated Books)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the answer of 26 November, Official Report, whether the court cases referred to involve the Obscene Publications Acts, the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 and the Customs (Consolidation) Act 1876; whether the instructions were in writing; and if he will publish them.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply 3 December, c. 17]: Customs take into account as far as is practicable cases under all the Acts quoted.

The instructions given were oral but officers were referred to the Department's internal standing instructions. It is not the practice to publish these.

TRANSPORT

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Ridley: The proportion is not known, and cannot be determined without disproportionate cost.

Aerial Crop Spraying

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he proposes to institute additional controls on aerial crop spraying; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Controls over aerial crop spraying are exercised by the Civil Aviation Authority under the Air Navigation Order 1980. The authority is just completing a thorough review of its requirements. Strengthened and more precise requirements will be in force before the beginning of next year's spraying season. Changes will include increasing the minimum horizontal separation which aircraft must maintain from houses to 200 ft; a requirement that aircraft must not fly below 200 ft over gardens; and a stipulation that water authorities must be consulted before spraying is carried out near water.

These changes are in addition to the strengthened requirements for the prior notification of adjacent occupiers which my hon. Friend and colleague the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport announced on 31 July at columns 209-210.

In addition in the Food and Environmental Protection Bill, which is currently under consideration in another place, Ministers are seeking powers which would enable them to make regulations to complement the controls already exercised by the Civil Aviation Authority.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Bill

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many statutory instruments he estimates will have to be made to implement fully the Local Government Bill; how many will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure; how many will be subject to the negative resolution procedure; how many will be subject to no parliamentary procedure; and how many will not have to be laid before either House.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is not possible to estimate such numbers at this stage.

Dog Licence

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he is planning to have with dog-owning members of the public regarding the proposed change in dog licensing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's consultation paper on dog licensing has been sent to a number of organisations representing dog owners, as well as to individuals who have written to the Department on this subject, or whose letters have been forwarded by hon. Members. Copies are available on request from the Department. We will consider the views of all interests, including those of dog owners, very carefully before reaching final decisions.

Home Insulation

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to begin re-examining the list of measures required within the building regulations intended to conserve fuel and power; and whether his re-examination will include requirements for floor insulation.

Sir George Young: Once the new building control system is in force next year, the content of the regulations, including the requirements for the conservation of fuel and power, will be reviewed. This review will include, among other measures, the case for extending the regulations to include general requirements for floor insulation.

Historic Buildings

Mr. Bulmer asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the historic buildings currently financed or administered by the metropolitan county councils or the Greater London council.

Mr. Macfarlane: The preparation and publication of lists giving this information is the responsibility of the individual local authorities.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly attributable or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The proportion of the running costs of the Department directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Attorney-General what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

The Solicitor-General: The proportion of the running costs of the Law Officers' Department directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

Expenditure

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence for how long the United Kingdom is committed to 3 per cent. annual real increases in defence expenditure.

Mr. Stanley: The public expenditure provision for 1985-86 allows for annual growth of some 3 per cent. in real terms, excluding Falklands costs. The 3 per cent. growth commitment has not been extended into 1986-87.

Falkland Islands (Air Mail)

Mr. Critchley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the free air mail letter facility for service men in the Falklands is to be continued; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: We fully appreciate the value and importance of the free air mail facility for service personnel in the Falklands and their families in the United Kingdom and this facility will be continued for the time being. The similar free Familygramme facility for those serving in South Georgia will likewise be continued.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Butler: This information is not available, nor can it be reliably estimated.

US Secretary of the Navy (Visit)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the purpose of the visit of the United States Secretary of the Navy, John Lehman, to the Scottish highlands from 6 to 9 September.

Mr. Stanley: I understand Mr. Lehman spent the weekend privately in the Scottish highlands following a number of official engagements in the United Kingdom.

Training Areas (Scotland)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any specific areas of land in Scotland have been considered for use as an Army training area since 24 January.

Mr. Stanley: The requirement for an Army training area in Scotland remains, but no specific areas are under active consideration.

Submarine Communications System (Scotland)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what investigations have been carried out by or for his Department into the potential use of land in Scotland for an extremely low frequency communications system for submarines.

Mr. Stanley: There is a naval requirement for such a site in Scotland. Several mainland areas are under consideration, although no firm decision has yet been taken.

Nuclear Tests (Service Men)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in respect of each of the following: Operation Grapple, carried out between May 1957 and September 1958 in the Gilbert and Ellis Islands, Operation Hurricane I, carried out on 3 October 1952 at Monte Bello Islands, Western Australia, Operations Totem 1 and 2, carried out on 14 and 26 October 1953 at Emu Field, South Australia, Operations Mosaic 1 and 2, carried out on 16 May and 19 June 1956 at Monte Bello Islands, Western Australia, Operations Buffalo 1, 2, 3 and 4, carried out in September and October 1956 at Maralinga, South Australia, and Operations Antler 1, 2 and 3, carried out in June and September 1957 at Maralinga, South Australia , he will state separately: (a) how many service men participated, (b) how many of those service men participating have had their cases examined by the National Radiological Protection Board in the study commissioned by his Department, and (c) if the National Radiological Protection Board has available to it, for the study commissioned by his Department the scientific advice given to Her Majesty's Government on the likely effects on participants in nuclear tests.

Mr. Butler: The number of service men who participated in each of the tests referred to is not readily available at this time. My predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie) said in the House on 12 March 1984 that about 20,000 men participated in the entire programme.

Almost all these individuals are known, and their details are being made available to the National Radiological Protection Board for it to consider for inclusion in the study. There will be no examination of individual cases.

The scientific advice given to Her Majesty's Government has no relevance to the study. However, the NRPB is, of course, well aware of the nationally and internationally agreed radiological standards which applied during the tests.

ENERGY

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the definitions of plutonium used by agencies sponsored by or responsible to his Department, specifying the isotopic composition of each.

Mr. Goodlad: Plutonium produced in United Kingdom civil reactors is not classified by the Department or its sponsored agencies into different grades defined by isotopic composition.

Miners' Co-operatives

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to seek to encourage the establishment of miners' co-operatives for the operation of coal mines once the current dispute is ended.

Mr. David Hunt: I have stated that I am always willing to consider any such proposal, but the NUM has shown no enthusiasm for this approach.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of registered blind people employed in my Department as at 1 June in each of the last four years was:

	Number
1981	4
1982	4
1983	4
1984	3

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Peter Walker: The proportion of the running costs of my Department directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost, but it would not be very large.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police Computers

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the constabularies outside the Metropolitan police area that have direct terminal links to the Metropolitan C department computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There are none.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the modus operandi or method index on the Metropolitan C department computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the method index includes data fields relating to persons, addresses, vehicles, offences and reference numbers.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Metropolitan C department computer has been or will be used in connection with the current miners dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to his Question on 19 November at column 7. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that he still has no plans to put the computer facilities dedicated to C department to any special use in connection with the miners' dispute.

Fines (South Western Magistrates' Court)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown of the offences for which fines are still owed at the south western magistrates' court, London.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the particular offences in respect of which fines are outstanding at the south western magistrates' court could not be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

Civil Defence Volunteers

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he intends that civil defence volunteers shall be instructed on law and order problems in the civil defence context.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Volunteers have an important role in civil defence, but we intend that responsibility for law and order should remain with the Government and the police.

Prisoners' Wives (Searches)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the sex of the prison officer who searched the wife of a prisoner who was visiting her husband at Her Majesty's prison, Walton, details of which have been sent to him by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside; and what was the extent of the search.

Mr. Mellor: The incident to which the hon. Member refers occurred on 29 October. At that time there was a special security alert at Liverpool prison, as at very many public buildings, following the bomb outrage at Brighton, and the hand luggage of all visitors to the prison was being searched. A notice was displayed at the prison gate accordingly. No exception was made in this case and the hand luggage of the prisoner's wife was searched by a male prison officer. My noble Friend, the Minister of State, will be replying shortly to the hon. Member's letters.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria is used in deciding to search wives of prisoners who visit their husbands in Her Majesty's prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The decision to conduct searches of visitors on a particular occasion is taken in the light of a range of factors, including the need to maintain security and good order and discipline within the establishment.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the searching of wives who visit their husbands at Her Majesty's prison, Walton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: One other hon. Member has written about this in the current year; there have also been a few petitions and I am advised that the governor of the prison has received about six letters. So far as we can establish in the time available, all these cases were about searches by the police when information had been received about drug smuggling.

limited list. I am about to start discussions with the representatives of the industry on the operation of the scheme.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department will take to seek to prevent doctors who presently prescribe inexpensive drugs which will not be on the limited list from prescribing instead more expensive drugs which remain available on prescription, following the implementation of limited list prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We would not expect many, if any, doctors to be so irresponsible as to provide expensive drugs unnecessarily when cheaper and equally effective drugs will be available to them on the new limited list. However, the present system of prescription monitoring will identify any significant variation in prescribing practices or costs. Our Department's regional medical officers will continue, for the time being, to undertake visits to practitioners as necessary to discuss changes in prescribing habits.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to extend the number of benzodiazepine drugs available under limited list prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The final list of drugs to remain available on the National Health Service in each of the groups covered by the limited list proposals will not be determined until consultation with the professions and industry is complete.

National Insurance (Contributions)

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the net cost to public funds of raising the lower earnings limit of national insurance contributions to £60 a week; and what would be the estimated net gain to public funds of raising the upper earnings limit of national insurance contributions to £730 a week.

Mr. Whitney: On the assumptions set out in the Government Actuary's report on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions Re-rating) (No. 2) Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386) the net loss to the national insurance fund from raising the lower earnings limit to £60 a week would be £100 million in a full year at 1984-85 rates; the net gain to the fund from raising the upper earning limit to £730 a week would be £1,325 million (assuming the upper profits level for class 4 contributions remained unchanged).

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to introduce exemption for employers from paying national insurance contributions on sickness payments as announced in the autumn statement.

Mr. Whitney: An amendment will be put down for discussion in Committee on the Social Security Bill to provide for employers to be compensated for their share of national insurance contributions payable on payments of statutory sick pay from 6 April 1985.

Statutory Sick Pay Scheme

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the latest information since 13 March on (a) employers with fewer than six employees, and (b) employers with six or more employees found to have (i) underpaid, or (ii) overpaid benefits under the statutory sick pay scheme.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available in the form requested The information given in reply to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on 27 April [c. 628] related to the number of individual employees' cases checked during all visits to each of the two groups of employers specified. The updated results of these checks available since 13 March are as follows:—

In the 4 weeks ending (1984)	Employers with fewer than 6 employees			Employers with 6 or more employees
	No. of individual cases checked	underpaid	overpaid		underpaid	overpaid
10 April	3,933	364	527	13,099	841	1,198
8 May	2,521	253	300	7,517	542	696
5 June	3,188	291	375	10,225	642	776
3 July	3,179	312	359	9,655	832	812
31 July	2,322	242	271	6,715	530	578
28 August	1,326	114	151	3,554	320	312

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out his reasons for extending the scope of coverage for sickness payments from eight weeks to 28 weeks effective from April 1986 as announced in the autumn statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's opening statement on 26 November 1984 at column 676 when moving Second Reading of the Social Security Bill.

Benefits

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been spent, in cost terms, by his Department in each of the last five years on promoting the take-up of benefits.

Mr. Whitney: It would not be possible without undue expense to calculate the total amounts spent by this Department on all measures designed to promote the take-up of benefits for each of the past five financial years. However, in cost terms (at 1983-84 prices) the amounts spent on promotional press and television advertising, and on the printing of all social security benefit leaflets and posters are estimated to be approximately as follows:

1979-80	*1,350,000
1980-81	*1,090,000
1981-82	*1,250,000
1982-83	†2,520,000
1983-84	1,620,000

* Excluding Department of Environment expenditure on rent and rate rebates before the introduction of housing benefit.

† Extra expenditure was incurred in this financial year on advertising the new housing benefit and statutory sick pay schemes.

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reopen negotiations on the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will be meeting the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry shortly.

Pharmaceuticals (Patent Life)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress he is making in his consideration of introducing an extension of the patent life for pharmaceutical products; what discussions he has had with the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 20 November at column 116-7.

Osteopathy

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will institute an inquiry into the practice of osteopathy; and whether he will take steps for osteopathy to have a recognised place within the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: We see no reason to hold such an inquiry. There is nothing to prevent a doctor from providing alternative therapies, including osteopathy, for his patients if he has the skill and training to do so. Health authorities may make use of the services of osteopaths if this is recommended by a consultant and they are satisfied that it is an appropriate use of resources, given other priorities.

NHS (Prescribed Drugs)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to remove antiseptic lozenges and sprays from the list of drugs that can be prescribed on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are now consulting the professions and the industry on the introduction of a limited list of drugs along the lines outlined by my right hon. Friend on 8 November at column 226-8. The Government will consider any suggestions made during consultation for limited lists in other therapeutic categories but we do not at present have any plans to extend the scheme in this way.

Ambulances

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the provision of ambulances per thousand citizens (a) nationally and (b) in Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest available statistics were compiled for the year 1982-83 by the York health authority. These show that the average number of ambulances per 100,000 population served was 15 for England and 12 for the Cambridgeshire ambulance service. However, these figures are not a good measure of service provision, since they take no account of distances to be travelled, traffic density, etc.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement regarding changes made in ambulance cover in the light of closures of hospital casualty departments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Standards of provision for both the emergency and non-emergency elements of the ambulance services have been set by our Department in relation to response times for emergency calls and waiting times for routine journeys. Responsibility for the day-to-day organisation and management of the ambulance services within those standards has been devolved to individual health authorities. In considering any rationalisation of accident and emergency services, we would expect a health authority to take into account the implications for the ambulance service, and to ensure that the standards we have set are attainable in the changed circumstances.

Satisfactory accident and emergency services depend on the support of highly trained staff, and a range of sophisticated equipment such as is available at a distict general hospital. We recognise that rationalisation of accident and emergency services based on such hospitals may, in some cases, mean longer journeys to hospital for treatment. The disadvantages of this are outweighed in most cases by the increasingly sophisticated services available from the ambulance crews, coupled with the benefits from the concentration of medical and nursing skills in a major accident and emergency department.

Dental Statistics

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average number of decayed, missing and filled teeth at 12 years of age in England; and how this compares with the position 10 years ago.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983, the average number of decayed, missing and filled teeth at 12 years of age was 3·3 in England. A comparable statistic is not available for England only in 1973 but for England and Wales together the average figure for 12-year-olds was 5·2.

Supplementary Professions

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give his Department's best estimate of norms for trained occupational therapists per thousand population aged 65 years or over; if he will also give the norms for associated therapy aids; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will give his Department's best estimate of norms for trained physiotherapists per thousand population aged 65 years or over; if he will also give the norms for therapy aids; and if he will make a statement.

of claims—are examined by the dental advisers of the Scottish Dental Estimates Board. References to the regional dental officers were as follows:

	Number
1980	1,740
1981	2,270
1982	2,570
1983	4,550

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the gross earnings of dentists in the National Health Service in each of the last five years, showing in each year the highest and lowest annual earnings paid.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Year	Highest gross earnings £	Lowest gross earnings £
1979	88,190	210
1980	116,497	423
1981	130,842	193
1982	152,326	93
1983	140,963	23

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of examinations which took place in 1980, 1981 and 1982 of the work done by those National Health dentists with gross earnings of £100,000 in the relevant year; and with what results.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	1980	1981	1982
Number of dentists with gross earnings of £100,000 or more	1	5	6
Number of references to the regional dental service in respect of work by those dentists	2	13	36

In two of the cases reported on by the regional dental service the dental advisors of the Scottish Dental Estimates Board considered that work had been unsatisfactory.

Fluoridation

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for allowing water authorities to fluoridate public water supplies.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government intend to introduce legislation this Session along the lines indicated in the reply given on 6 December 1983 at column 143-44 by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley).

Hospital Beds

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many hospital beds have been permanently closed in each health board area between the end of 1979 and the present date; and what further closures are contemplated in the current financial year.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 24 October to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) at column 626-28. In 1984 to date the following closures have taken place:

	Number of beds
Argyll and Clyde Health Board	32
Ayrshire and Arran Health Board	26
Grampian Health Board	26
Shetland Health Board	19

Note: Numbers refer to the approved bed complement at the time of closure: Details provided relate only to complete hospitals taken out of use; information on partial closures or changes of use is not held centrally. Most of the beds closed have been replaced in alternative facilities.

Further hospital closures have been approved by the Secretary of State, but it is not possible to say whether they will take effect during the current financial year.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons were on hospital waiting lists in Scotland in March in each of the last six years; and how many there were in the September of each of those years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Names on lists

	March	September
1978	56,022	61,481
1979	76,616	70,970
1980	69,904	67,180
1981	67,679	65,024
1982	66,692	86,179
1983	96,757	88,213
1984	*84,790	*83,061

* Provisional.

NHS (Nursing Staff)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of total nursing staff in National Health Service hospitals was engaged exclusively in the care of the mentally ill and handicapped in each of the last five years; what these figures represented in terms of staff per 100 patients; and what were the comparable figures for other National Health Service services.

Mr. John MacKay: For the National Health Service in Scotland, this information is as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
(a) Psychiatric nurses as percantage all hospital nurses.
Mental Illness*	14·9	14·7	14·7	14·5	14·4
Mental Handicap	5·2	5·2	5·3	5·2	5·3
(b) Nursing staff per 100 average occupied beds.
Mental Illness	61·5	64·5	68·8	70·1	71·8
Mental Handicap	51·5	55·2	59·7	60·9	63·1
Maternity	234·5	250·3	268·4	287·7	306·9
General	134·3	140·4	146·2	151·5	151·1

* Since 1982 the first 18 months of all student nurse training has been generic in nature. Because of this some mental illness students may have been recorded as general students with the result that statistics for mental illness students are understated and those for general students overstated.

Mental Hospitals (Food Costs)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the weekly cost of food per patient in mental hospitals in each of the last five years; and what were the comparable figures for other hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows:

Total average cost of patient catering per patient consumer week

	1979-80 £	1980-81 £	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £
Mental/Mental Deficiency Hospitals	10·95	12·54	13·77	14·54	15·04
Acute Hospitals	16·50	18·59	20·17	21·30	21·37
Geriatric and other Long-Stay	12·75	14·38	15·68	16·73	17·45
Maternity	19·68	21·82	24·33	25·62	26·36
Other costed hospitals	15·53	17·63	19·63	20·37	20·81
All hospitals average	13·60	15·46	16·93	17·82	18·26

The lower turnover of patients in long-stay hospitals permits more efficient catering provision and helps to contain catering costs.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now announce the result of his consideration of the Public Accounts Committee's recommendation that the Forestry Commission should disclose the sums received after selling public land.

Mr. Younger: The recommendation by the Committee of Public Accounts at paragraph 17(vi) of its Eighteenth Report, HC265, 1983-84, was that the Forestry Commission "should publish the selling price of publicly-owned land when sold and a full explanation of their sales policy and practice".

That explanation of sales policy and practice was provided by the Commission in its annual report for the year to 31 March 1984, which was laid before the House on 28 November 1984.

The Government have given long and careful consideration to the allied question of whether the Commission should publish the prices it receives from its sales. We are satisfied, however, that the Commission is not selling off its assets cheaply and that the rules of public accountability are not being breached either in the Commission's sales policy or in its individual sales. We do not feel justified, therefore, in requiring the Commission to depart unilaterally from normal commercial practice, which applies throughout the Government sector as well as in private transactions, by publishing prices received from sales of forestry properties.

British Leyland (Bathgate Plant)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his recent discussions with British Leyland about the Bathgate plant.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I are in close touch with senior British Leyland representatives. They have encouraged the interest of potential purchasers of the Bathgate plant, notably two companies, Marshalls Tractors and JCB, who are considering whether they can develop viable proposals which could lead to acquisition of part of the assets. My Department has made contact with these companies to ensure that they are fully aware that regional assistance is available to maximise viable investment and employment at Bathgate.

Following initial approaches to a number of companies worldwide, Locate in Scotland has identified and approached well over a hundred which could have the capability to make use of the Bathgate facilities.

This marketing campaign, unprecedented for a single site, has subsequently been reinforced by the acceptance of my right hon. Friend and others of the recommendations of the Bathgate working party about improvement to the environment, communications and promotion of the area, and by the Government's recently announced decision to upgrade Bathgate to inner tier status, enabling companies in the area to qualify for maximum regional assistance for investment.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the adminstrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Younger: The proportion of the running costs of the Scottish Office directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

Rape

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many men have been prosecuted for rape in each of the last five years in Scotland; how many have been convicted in each of these years; and, of these, how many have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment of less than three years, between three and five years, between five and 10 years and over 10 years, respectively.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is:

Persons proceeded against for rape, Scotland

*including detention in a Young Offenders' Institution.

Local Authorities (Ministerial Default Powers)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out in detail the range of default powers open to him and other Ministers in dealing with local authorities in Scotland in the same form as used by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in his reply to the hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe on 11 April 1984, Official Report, column 249.

Mr. Younger: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Parole

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the outcome of his consultations with the Parole Board regarding possible changes in relation to the release of prisoners on parole.

Mr. Younger: I hope soon to make a full statement about these matters.

Sexual Offences

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish the second report on the investigation into evidence in cases of rape and other sexual offences

Mr Ancram: We hope to publish the second report by the Scottish Office central research unit on the processing of sexual assault cases, dealing with prosecution and court stages, early next year.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dental Treatment

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the present arrangements for preventing and detecting unnecessary dental treatment in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am becoming increasingly concerned that a small minority of dentists might be abusing the present system of payments to dentists under the NHS and that the present legal provisions and methods of detection might be inadequate to prevent this and act as a proper deterrent. I have asked a small but distinguished committee to investigate the matter and give me advice as quickly as possible.

The committee will be chaired by Mr. S. G. Schanschieff, Chairman of Northampton health authority. The other members will be Professor D. F. Shovelton, professor of restorative dentistry, Birmingham university and Mr. J. Toulmin QC. The committee's terms of reference will be:

"To enquire into the extent of unnecessary dental treatment in the general dental service; to consider methods of preventing and detecting such treatment; to consider any amendments which may be necessary to the relevant legal provisions; and to make recommendations together with the estimated costs of those recommendations."

The committee is expected to report by the middle of 1985.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provisions will be made to ensure the maintenance of school dental inspections and treatment for children and services for special schools and homes in areas covered by the Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton district health authorities arising from their recent decision to close four of their community dental service clinics.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton health authority has put forward a proposal to close four commmunity dental service clinics. This has been the subject of formal consultation locally and the health authority will need to consider the outcome of that consultation before a final decision is taken. If the health authority's proposal is implemented however I understand that the remaining dental staff would be deployed so as to provide the necessary dental inspection and treatment of pupils at maintained schools.

MIND (Correspondence)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has sent to the legal director of MIND in answer to the letter he received from him about transfer of mentally disturbed patients to mental hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have been unable to identify the particular letter from the information supplied by the hon. Member. However, if she provides further details I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Cervical Cancer

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is proposing to take new steps to seek to reduce the numbers of deaths from cervical cancer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of deaths from cervical cancer is already falling but we are seeking to make further progress towards this objective through our cervical screening programme. We issued revised guidelines on the implementation of our policy to health authorities in July. A copy of the guidance, HC(84)17, is in the Library.

Drugs (Imports)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are being made to monitor the import of drugs from the People's Republic of China, following the introduction of limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: For a medicinal product to be imported from the People's Republic of China (and other countries outside the European Community), a valid United Kingdom product licence, under the Medicines Act 1968, relating to the product, must be in existence. Before a product can qualify for a product licence, the licensing authority must be satisfied that the product is safe, efficacious and of good quality. Importers of all such licenced products are required to ensure that their products conform to acceptable standards and are subject to appropriate checks as well as being liable for inspection by our Medicines Inspectorate.

Questions of the volume of trade in a medicinal product are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Heating Allowances

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of supplementary pensioners in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside, (b) West Yorkshire and (c) the Huddersfield area who have received increases of less than £1·75 per week as a result of cuts to their heating allowances; and what is the average deduction involved.

Mr. Whitney: Of the areas listed, reliable estimates of the increases in benefit received by supplementary pensioners at the general uprating this November could be obtained only for Yorkshire and Humberside and then only at disproportionate cost. Supplementary benefit heating additions were increased from 26 November in line with the rise in fuel prices over the year to last May, although we decided that it would be reasonable to increase to £1, and reapply to heating additions, the available scale margin deduction from weekly payments for special needs given to people receiving the higher long-term rate of supplementary benefit. The reasons for this decision are set out in the reply given by my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) on 27 November at column 468.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements have been made for the United Kingdom Medicines Inspectorate to inspect the products of overseas drugs manufacturers for the period after the implementation of limited list prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The usual effective arrangements will continue to apply. Manufacturers of all licensed products, whether United Kingdom or overseas-based, are required to ensure that their products conform to acceptable standards of strength, quality and purity and their premises are subject to inspection.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why such a short time has been allowed for consultation over the limited list drugs proposal.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke The period allowed for consultation is almost three months, which we regard as adequate. We have already received preliminary views from several bodies and expect to have received all substantive comments by 31 January 1985.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how the anticipated saving of £100 million from the limited list proposals is calculated in terms of the main categories namely (a) antacids, (b) laxatives, (c) inhalations, (d) anti-tussives, (e) analgesics for mild to moderate pain, (f) vitamins, tonics and bitters and (g) benzodiazepines, sedatives and tranquillisers, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke The approximate percentage of the total anticipated savings that will be contributed by each therapeutic group affected by the limited list proposal is as follows:

	Per cent.
Antacids	17
Laxatives	7
Cough and cold remedies	17
Analgesics for mild to moderate pain	30
Vitamins and Tonics	4
Benzodiazepine sedatives and tranquillisers	25

No firm estimates will be possible until the proposals are finalised following consultation.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the reasons for the proposed limited list being more restrictive than the current hospital formulary drawn up by local therapeutic committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke The Government's proposals aim to provide effective low-cost medicines to meet the clinical needs in a small number of therapeutic categories. If there are differences of significance between these proposals and the 400 or so hospital formularies we would expect these to be reflected in consultation.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how new discoveries in fields such as the mild to moderate analgesic market will be treated following the introduction of a limited list scheme;

(2) whether he will allow branded products to continue to be prescribed where there is no accepted generic substitute, although the branded product may be in the limited list;

(3) if he will ensure sufficient safeguards are proposed for the elderly taking a variety of medicines in the limited list which at present are distinctively branded and coloured to enable them to distinguish between different pills in a variety of white and unbranded packaging;

(4) if dispensing general practitioners will be permitted to prescribe and dispense private prescriptions following the introduction of the limited list;

(5) if he will ensure that arthritic patients unable to take non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs because of gastro-intestinal side effects continue to be able to obtain suitable drugs on prescription after the introduction of limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These matters will be fully considered during our consultations with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is proposed that a doctor prescribing a branded product for a clinical purpose outside the indication list for limited list products will have to disclose the diagnosis on the form FP10.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is no question of doctors having to give their diagnoses on prescription forms. If a drug is available through the National Health Service under the proposed limited list arrangements doctors will be able to prescribe it whenever appropriate. If it is not available then it will not be prescribable for any condition.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will advise family practitioner committees about the effects of his proposals for limited list prescribing on the availability of National Health Service treatment for people suffering from coughs, dyspepsia, pain or bowel function disorders.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Once all details of the scheme have been finalised following consultation, family practitioner committees will be advised in the normal way.

available. We hope agreement will be reached this month on the 1985 programme, whereas the 1984 programme was only settled in May this year. The normal procedures for purchase and shipment of food aid after allocations have been agreed are complex, but there are more rapid emergency procedures, the use of which we have strongly supported in appropriate cases.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Jopling: The work undertaken by my departments which is directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the EC cannot easily be distinguished from other work. Many programmes contain both EC and non-EC elements; not all activities carried out in connection with membership of the EC are obligatory; and some programmes now forming part of our Community obligations were previously operated under national arrangements. Although, therefore, it is not possible to give the precise cost of administering duties arising from membership of the EC, it is estimated that between one quarter and one third of the running costs of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in 1983-84 was attributable to EC membership. The running costs of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce are wholly attributable to EC work.

Wholesale Milk Deliveries

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average percentage trend in wholesale milk deliveries between 1981 and 1983 in the United Kingdom; and what was the percentage trend in wholesale deliveries between 1981 and 1983 in each of the nine regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 136]: The following additional information requested on the percentage trend in wholesale deliveries between 1981 and 1983 is now available:

	Percentage increases
1. The area to which the Scottish Milk Marketing Scheme 1933 applies, other than Region 2 below	5·2
2. The islands of Arran, Bute, Coll, Gigha, Great Cumbrae, and Kintyre South of Tarbert	14·4
3. The area to which the Aberdeen and District Milk Marketing Scheme 1933 applies	11·7
4. The area to which the North of Scotland Milk Marketing Scheme 1933 applies, other than the Islands of Orkney	8·31
5. The Islands of Orkney*	19·4
6. The Islands of Shetland*	26·8

* The islands of Shetland and Orkney take up only 0·15 per cent. and 1·14 per cent. respectively of total Scottish quota.

Milk Prices

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to decontrol milk prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have held discussions with the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales, the Dairy Trade Federation and the National Farmers Union with a view to improving the competitive position within the milk industry. In the light of those discussions, and of separate discussions which have taken place in Northern Ireland my right hon. Friends and I have decided that statutory price control of milk in England, Wales and Northern Ireland should end on 31 December 1984, a year earlier than the target date which I announced in my reply of 3 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley. In addition my right hon. Friend and I propose to appoint management consultants to advise us on an examination of the commercial activities of the Board having regard to paragraph 53(4) of the Milk Marketing Scheme. The Dairy Trade Federation and the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales have indicated that they are content with these moves. They have reached an understanding on improved procedures for the period after decontrol which will help the industry to resolve disputes without having to invoke statutory procedures. In addition the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales has agreed with the National Farmers Union and the Farmers Union of Wales arrangements for consultation on matters affecting producer interests.

I believe that the measures represent a major improvement in our milk marketing arrangements. I am placing in the Library of the House terms of reference of the proposed study, the text of the understanding reached with the Board and the Federation and the text of a letter from the Chairman of the Board to the President of the National Farmers Union.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the instructions given to the United Kingdom delegation to the first committee of the United Nations General Assembly with regard to the three resolutions calling for a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: We remain ready to support at the United Nations resolutions which recognise that international agreement on nuclear testing constraints can only emerge from the resolution of outstanding problems of verification. We will not support resolutions which ignore this important factor. Our voting record at the first committee this year reflects the above position, including our support for further work at the Geneva conference on disarmament.

Saharan Region

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of countries in the Saharan region.

Mr. Rifkind: We enjoy diplomatic relations with all the countries of the Saharan region, with the sole exception of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In some cases, diplomatic representation is on a non-residential basis.

Namibia

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether he will make a statement on the efforts of the multi-party conference of the internal political parties in Namibia to organise a peace conference and in particular the multi-party conference statement of 30 October which calls for such a conference and for the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation's response to be awaited until December;

(2) whether the Government support the efforts of the multi-party conference of Namibia's internal political parties in their moves to negotiate for peaceful independence of Namibia at the earliest possible date; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken in response to the call by the multi-party conference of internal parties in Namibia to the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation to end all hostilities before 31 December 1984 in order to establish the conditions essential for a peace conference; and will he make a statement;

(4) what steps the Government are taking to support the efforts of the multi-party conference in Namibia to bring greater representation to the people of Namibia with or without the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation.

Mr. Rifkind: We support all moves which bring an internationally recognised independence for Namibia closer. We remain committed to the early implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia, which is the internationally agreed basis for such a settlement. We believe that current negotiations led by the United States offer the best hope of achieving this.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what specific representations the Government have made to the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation in the last six months to end its campaign of political violence in northern Namibia;

(2) what representations the contact groups have made to the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation about its campaign of violence being an obstacle to Namibian independence.

Mr. Rifkind: We have consistently condemned violence in Namibia whether by the South African armed forces or by SWAPO. Violence can do nothing to assist the process of achieving a Namibia settlement.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what verification measures the British delegation to the United Nations conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva plans to propose to seek to facilitate a limited chemical weapons ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: Following our earlier verification proposals, the United Kingdom is considering tabling a further working paper next year on how to verify that certain civil chemicals are not diverted into illicit military stockpiles. As I made clear in my reply to the hon. Member on 29 October at column 815, we seek a comprehensive chemical weapons ban. A limited or regional ban would not be an adequate substitution.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Renton: In 1983-84, 1·06 per cent. (£3,947,703) of the running costs of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, including the Overseas Development Administration, was attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Overseas Students (Fees)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications for commercial relationships between the United Kingdom and other countries of the increases made by the Government in fees for overseas students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: When the Government made the decision in 1979 to charge full cost fees for overseas students, we took into account all the relevant political and commercial factors against the background of using the limited resources for overseas students to maximum effect in the national interest. We later came to the conclusion that we should limit the damage to our commercial interests by replacing the indiscriminate subsidy with targeted support to overseas students. This included, besides specific country schemes, the creation of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's scholarships and awards scheme, the criteria of which include business-and-trade-related objectives, in addition to giving awards to particularly able students from countries with whom the United Kingdom's economic relations are expected to develop. Within the resources available, we believe our policy best serves our political and commercial interests.

Hong Kong

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and commonwealth Affairs how many of the 6,000 British Dependent Territories citizens whom he believes the Chinese Government may not consider to be Chinese compatriots under the draft agreement with the Chinese Government acquired their present citizenship by birth in (a) Hong Kong and (b) elsewhere in the Dependent Territories; and how many acquired citizenship by descent and by naturalisation, respectively.

Mr. Luce: The Hong Kong Government estimate that approximately 4,000 of the British Dependent Territories citizens to whom my hon. Friend refers acquired their present citizenship by birth in Hong Kong, none by birth in other dependent territories and approximately 180 by naturalisation. The figure for those who have obtained their citizenship by descent is unobtainable.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the total numbers of British Dependent Territories citizens presently resident in Hong Kong; how many of these possess no other citizenship or nationality; and how many are entitled to the right of abode in Hong Kong.

Mr. Luce: The Hong Kong Government estimate that there are about 3 million BDTCs resident in Hong Kong. The Chinese Government probably regard all but about 6,000 of these to be Chinese nationals as defined in the Chinese memorandum. In the time available, it is not possible to estimate how many of this latter figure have no other citizenship or nationality. All 3 million BDTCs have the right of abode in Hong Kong.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Scottish Law Commission

45. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will meet the Scottish Law Commission.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have no meetings with the Scottish Law Commission arranged at present but both formal and informal meetings are held from time to time. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate recently met the commission and discussed various matters of law reform including the implementation of commission reports. I am glad to say that in three Bills during the present Session we hope to implement a total of six reports.

Peterhead Prison (Assaults)

46. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will consult the procurator fiscal at Peterhead sheriff court with a view to reducing the period taken to bring prisoners from Peterhead prison for trial for assaults upon prison officers.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I intend to consult the procurator fiscal at Peterhead and I will be writing to my hon. Friend.

Coal Industry Dispute

47. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what discussions he has had with sheriffs' courts on cases involving miners.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have not had any such discussions.

50. Mr. Henderson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions in Fife and Scotland have been or are being pursued relating to violence and other offences and crimes, arising out of the current industrial dispute in the coal industry; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As at 28 November 1984, 200 persons have been prosecuted in Fife for offences arising out of the mining dispute. The comparable figure for Scotland as a whole is approximately 800. The majority of accused have been charges with breach of the peace or obstruction of the police in the execution of their duty. However, there is also a small but nevertheless disturbing number of persons who have been charged with assault. There is an underlying element of violence and intimidation in many of those cases where the charge is that of breach of the peace or obstruction.

Legal Aid

48. Mr. Douglas asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will make a statement on the recent advice he has given in relation to the operation of legal aid to the court systems in Scotland.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have not given any recent advice in relation to the operation of legal aid to the court systems in Scotland. This is not a matter on which my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I give advice to the courts.

Law Society of Scotland

49. Mr. Malone asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he next intends to meet the president of the Law Society of Scotland.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have no such meetings arranged at present. However, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I meet the president of the Law Society of Scotland from time to time to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Drugs

51. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many cases involving drugs have been and are under investigation in the current year in Lothian region and in Scotland; which age groups are involved; how many prosecutions have been brought; how many convictions there have been; whether this represents an increase on the figures for 1982-83 and for 1983-84; what steps he is taking to deal with this problem; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The detailed information sought by my hon. Friend is not readily available. I shall write to him with any such information as can be obtained. Crown Office figures set out in the table below for drugs cases in the High Court of Justiciary in the current year and 1983 indicate a substantial increase in the number of serious cases involving drugs in the current year, both in Lothian and in Scotland generally.

My Department's responsibility lies in the prosecution of drugs cases, not their investigation. To ensure the most effective prosecution of serious drugs cases I held a meeting on 8 October 1984 with Crown counsel and senior officers responsible for drugs cases from the Crown Office, procurator fiscal service, all the Scottish police forces, Customs and Excise and forensic Science laboratories, at which practical aspects of the preparation and prosecution of these cases were discussed. The meeting was very useful and I am confident that the already high conviction rate in such cases shown in the table will be maintained.

Drugs cases in the High Court of Justiciary 1983-84

	Total cases indicted	Total cases dealt with*	Cases in which conviction	Cases remitted for sentence
1983
Scotland	30	30	27	4
Lothian	8	8	7	—
1984
Scotland	122	99	94	4
Lothian	38	30	29	—

* To 30 November 1984.

Prosecution Policy

52. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what advice his Department gives to procurators fiscal with regard to deciding between prosecutions or warnings in matters involving members of councils and members of crime prevention panels.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No advice is given on these specific points.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Nurses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many trained nurses from the Republic of Ireland are presently employed in Northern Ireland hospitals.

Dr. Boyson: The information requested is not available.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many student nurses have just completed their training at the Royal Victoria hospital; and how many will be offered positions as nurses in that hospital.

Dr. Boyson: 41 student nurses will complete their training on 21 December 1984 and none has been offered a post at the hospital to date.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many student nurses have recently completed their training at Ards hospital; and how many nursing posts at this hospital will be available to them.

Dr. Boyson: 13 nurses recently completed their training, four have taken up permanent nurse posts and three have obtained temporary nurse posts in the hospital.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many student nurses from the Republic of Ireland are presently being trained within Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: Sixty-three.

Milk Production

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the revised closing date for the collection of the first super levy instalments for milk production in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: The date set by the Commission for all members states is 14 December 1984.

Local Government Elections

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date he will announce the ward groupings for the proposed local government elections next year.

Mr. Hurd: I have today laid before Parliament the report of the District Electoral Areas Commissioner, Sir Frank Harrison, MBE, QC, DL, which contains his recommendations for the grouping of wards into district electoral areas for the purposes of local government elections in Northern Ireland. I shall shortly be bringing forward for approval a draft Order-in-Council under section 38(1)(a) of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973 giving effect, with or without modifications, to the Commissioner's recommendations.

Blackwater Drainage Scheme

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost of the Blackwater drainage scheme; how this cost is to be divided between Her Majesty's Government, the Government of the Republic of Ireland and the European Community; how many jobs the scheme will provide; when it is to be completed; and what inquiry has been held into the opinions of local farmers and others concerned.

Dr. Boyson: The total estimated cost of the Blackwater drainage scheme is £29 million, of which Her Majesty's Government will meet £16 million and the Republic of Ireland £13 million. The European Community is contributing approximately £5 million in grant-aid which is to be shared between both Governments. It is not possible to assess with precision the effect on employment since the majority of the work will be carried out by contractors. However it is considered that up to 250 jobs could be provided during the five-year construction period which will end in 1989-90.

In accordance with statutory requirements the scheme was published in regional and local newspapers and exhibited at local council offices. There was also consultation with local farmers, district councils and with angling and conservation interests.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Dr. Boyson: The number of registered blind people employed over the last four years in the Departments for which the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is responsible.

	Number
1981	6
1982	5
1983	5
1984	6

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Hurd: The proportion of the running costs of the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

European Day of Music

Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have any plans for the official celebration on 22 June 1985 of the European Day of Music.

The Prime Minister: The arrangements for European Music Year are in the hands of the United Kingdom organising committee, chaired by His Royal Highness Duke of Kent. The date of 22 June is intended particularly as a day to celebrate amateur music-making, and musicians and schools are being encouraged to take part accordingly.

SCOTLAND

Corporal Punishment

10. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has plans to introduce legislation to give parents in Scotland the right to withdraw their children from corporal punishment in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As announced in the Gracious Speech, a Bill will be brought forward later in this Session to enable parents of children educated at public expense to exempt their children from corporal punishment.

Nursery Education

11. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce measures to restore the duty on the local authorities to provide nursery education as previously stated in the Education (Scotland) Act 1962.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No, Sir. The duty prescribed in the 1962 Act was defined in only the broadest terms. It left education authorities very wide discretion in practice; and I see nothing to be gained by reverting to it.

Crime Prevention Panels

12. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to change the method by which appointments are made to crime prevention panels.

Mr. Ancram: No. I think that these appointments are best left to local decision by chief constables.

NHS Privatisation

13. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has had to his recent circular on National Health Service privatisation.

Mr. John MacKay: The majority of health boards are complying directly with the request to test the cost-effectiveness of their catering, laundry and domestic services. Others are taking steps to improve the efficiency of such services. However, competitive tendering is the ultimate test of efficiency and I expect all boards to apply it.

27. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next meet the chairmen of the health boards in Scotland to discuss his privatisation proposals.

Mr. John MacKay: I discussed competitive tendering with them at our regular meeting on 13 November. I expect to meet them again on 12 March 1985.

Manufacturing Industry

14. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been lost in manufacturing industry since 1979; and how many closures have been reported to him.

Mr. Younger: The latest estimates indicate that the number of jobs in manufacturing industry in Scotland fell by 164,000 between June 1979 and June 1984; over the same period 613 closures in manufacturing industry, involving 10 or more workers, were notified to the Manpower Services Commission.

Teachers (Salaries and Conditions)

15. Mr. Gourlay asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received for an independent review body for Scottish teachers' salaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg).

37. Mr. Lambie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he is going to reply to the request by the teachers of Scotland for an independent review of their salaries and conditions.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg).

Youth Training Scheme

16. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number and percentage of mode A participants on the youth training scheme in Scotland in 1983-84 who are at present in employment.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I regret that detailed information on the destinations of youngsters leaving the youth training scheme in Scotland is not yet available.

Denominational Schools, Midlothian

17. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received notice of appeals against proposed closures of denominational schools in the parliamentary constituency of Midlothian.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No.

Regional Policy

18. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the impact on the Scottish economy of the Government's regional policy.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) earlier today.

Housing Costs

19. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what central Government contribution is being made in 1984-85 and 1985-86 towards local authority housing costs in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Housing support grants totalling £52·5 million have been made in 1984-85. Final decisions on a possible variation of this amount and on the amount of grants for 1985-86 will be taken after a meeting with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 10 December.

Education

20. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet representatives of the teaching unions in Scotland to discuss matters relating to education in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since the present Government took office, my right hon. Friend and I have met representatives of teaching unions on a number of occasions. There are no current plans for further meetings.

Accommodation Agencies Act 1953

21. Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what statistics or other information he gathers about the operation in Scotland of the Accommodation Agencies Act 1953.

Mr. Ancram: Offences under the Act would fall to be included in the criminal statistics collected and published by my Department. No offences under the Act have been recorded by the police since 1974.

Fish Processing Agency

22. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate the situation in the fish processing industry, particularly in the Banff and Buchan constituency, and take steps to grant temporary financial aid in order to prevent further losses of employment in that industry.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend is aware that reduced supplies of white fish have been causing difficulties for the fish processing industry. He has no plans to provide financial aid, but so as to ease the supply situation he has urged the European Commission in its negotiations with Norway, to seek the highest TACs justifiable for the main North sea stocks in 1985.

Employment (Fife)

23. Mr. Willie. W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effects of the proposed new regional aid policy on employment prospects in Fife.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The new assisted area map preserves the assisted area status of the greater part of Fife at a level which reflects its position relative to other parts of the country. The areas remaining assisted will continue to qualify for regional selective assistance and other benefits which will enable them to continue to compete effectively for new investment and jobs.

Standard Grade Examination

24. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many pupils in Scotland will be taking the standard grade examinations in 1986.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Firm figures will not be available until schools and other presenting centres submit provisional estimates of presentations to the Scottish examination board in October 1985. On present indications, about 77,500 pupils are expected to complete courses in S4 and to be presented for one or more standard grade examination in 1986. Estimates of candidates at other levels of secondary education are not available at this stage.

Local Authority Financial Needs

25. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how soon he expects to be able to remove the damping effects presently involved in the phasing in of the client group approach to assessing local authority financial needs.

Mr. Ancram: My aim is to move towards full implementation of the client group method for the distribution of needs element of rate support grant as quickly as is consistent with avoiding undue grant losses for those authorities which stand to lose.

Education Provision, Tayside

26. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision he has made in rate support grant for education provision in Tayside.

Mr. Ancram: Rate support grant is paid in support of an authority's income generally. It is not attributed to particular services.

Job Creation

28. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new jobs have been created in Scotland in the past 12 months.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Comprehensive information on new jobs created is not available. However, over 14,500 new jobs have been associated with offers of selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 for projects in Scotland during the past year. It is also encouraging that in the year to June 1984 the net total of employees in employment in Scotland is estimated to have increased by 15,000.

Health Boards (Chairmen)

29. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairmen of the health boards; and what issues they discussed.

Mr. John MacKay: I last met health board chairmen on 13 November 1984, and discussed with them a number of matters related to the management and financing of the NHS in Scotland.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

30. Mr. Hugh D. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next be meeting the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board; and what subjects he will be discussing.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board regularly, and I myself met him last on 13 November; my right hon. Friend has, however, no immediate plans to meet him.

Hill Farming

31. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the National Farmers Union about the profitability of hill farming in Scotland.

Mr. George Younger: The profitability of hill farming in Scotland forms part of the annual review of the economic situation in the hills and uplands which takes place each autumn. The review is carried out in close co-operation with the SNFU, which put forward its views on the current situation in Scotland. This year's review has just been completed and the results were announced on 29 November.

Caravan Sites (Rating)

32. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is to introduce retrospective rate rebates when the Rating of Caravan Sites (Scotland) Order 1984 comes into operation on 1 April 1985.

Mr. Ancram: No.

Children's Hospitals (Expenditure)

33. Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to reduce expenditure on children's hospitals in the west of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend does not allocate funds to individual hospitals: it is for the health boards to determine the level of funding each hospital should receive.

Labour Statistics

34. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of those aged over 50 years who are unemployed in Scotland and Lanarkshire in particular.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 11 October 1984, the latest date for which the information is available, there were 54,403 unemployed claimants aged 50 and over in Scotland and 5,550 in the areas covered by jobcentres in Lanarkshire.

School Further Education, Jordanhill

35. Mr. Roy Jenkins asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of lecturers at further education colleges in Scotland have undertaken training at the school of further education, Jordanhill, Glasgow.

Mr. Younger: At October 1983, the latest date for which information is available, the basic teaching qualification in further education from the school of further education at Jordanhill college was held by 44 per cent. of lecturers at further education colleges in Scotland. A further 5 per cent. hold a teaching qualification in further education from a college elsewhere in the United Kingdom and an additional 23 per cent. hold a teaching qualification in secondary education. A number of lecturers have also taken in-service training at the school of further education or elsewhere.

Composite Classes

36. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the use of composite classes in the Scottish educational system.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Composite classes have long been a feature of the Scottish educational system. Such classes are not inherently unsound educationally, so long as they are formed with due regard for the needs of the pupils concerned and provided the work of each class is adapted to the abilities of individual pupils through, for example, the use of group and individual methods.

Skillcentres

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the number of skillcentre places available per 100,000 work force in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: For each 100,000 of the work force it is estimated that there were 54 skillcentre places available in Scotland in September 1984, the latest date for which information is readily available.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Younger: In 1983 I had four registered blind and nine registered partially sighted officers employed in my Department. Figures for previous years are not available.

Housing Associations

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sheltered housing units have been built in Scotland in each of the last three years; and how many of these were built by housing associations.

Mr. Younger: The table shows the estimated increases in the numbers of sheltered dwelling units in each of the last three financial years:

Year	Additional sheltered dwellings
	All agencies	Housing associations
1981-82	2,400	1,150
1982-83	2,000	750
1983-84	1,700	650

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total expenditure of housing associations in Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 17 July at columns 175-78.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the total allocation of finance available for capital programmes to housing associations in Scotland has been spent in the Strathclyde region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: Expenditure by housing associations in Strathclyde region in each of the years from 1979-80 to 1983-84 represented 56 per cent., 57 per cent., 58 per cent., 56 per cent. and 59 per cent. of the respective totals for Scotland.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many housing units have been created by new build and rehabilitations, respectively, by housing associations in Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is as follows:

Financial Year	Number of Units
	New Build	Rehabilitated*
1979-80	740	1059
1980-81	1286	2448
1981-82	1617	2820
1982-83	1133	2302
1983-84	1597	2983

* The figures shown, which are net of any gain or loss of dwellings in the tenders approved, are for projects undertaken by the Housing Corporation.

Building Regulations

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to begin re-examining the list of measures required within the building regulations intended to conserve fuel and power; and whether his re-examination will include requirements for floor insulation.

Mr. Ancram: On 29 November I announced a package of measures for improving the building control system in Scotland, including a re-assessment of the technical content of the building standards regulations. The regulations relating to the conservation of fuel and power, and the possibility of extending these to ground floor insulation, will be covered by these studies.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a list of the names of those local authorities and other organisations which have protested to him about the proposed amendments to Part Q of the Building Standards (Scotland) Regulations 1981 and 1982; and what reply he has made to them.

Mr. Ancram: There have been 69 replies from individuals, local authorities and other organisations commenting on these proposals. Many responses contain degrees of criticism and approval of individual parts of the proposal, and it would be misleading to classify them simply as protests or endorsements.

All responses will be carefully considered and, except where confidentiality was specifically requested, responses can be inspected on open file in the Scottish Office Library at St. Andrew's House. They will be taken fully into account in the preparation of the Government's detailed conclusions which will be announced in due course.

Grain Storage, Glenrothes

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much grain is stored in Glenrothes, Fife; what were the comparable figures for each of the last three years; what is the estimated cost of such storage; and how much is stocked elsewhere in Scotland, and at what cost.

Mr. John MacKay: As at 31 October, stocks of intervention grain held in Scotland totalled 294,000 tonnes, of which 9,900 tonnes were held at Glenrothes. No intervention grain was held in that store in any of the previous three years.

Storage costs are recorded on a UK basis and separate figures for Scotland are not available. The cost of storage at a particular store derives from the contractual terms negotiated between the Intervention Board and the individual storekeeper. This information is commercially confidential.

NHS Beds (Occupancy)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of National Health Service beds was occupied by mentally-ill and mentally-handicapped persons in each of the last five years; and what percentage of consultants worked with such patients in each of those years.

Mr. John MacKay: For the National Health Service in Scotland, this information is as follows:

	Percentage of NHS hospital beds occupied by patients with		Percentage of NHS consultants working with patients with
	(a) Mental illness	(b) Mental handicap	(a) Mental illness	(b) Mental handicap
1979	31·6	13·1	12·0	0·8
1980	31·2	12·8	11·9	0·8
1981	30·8	12·8	12·0	0·8
1982	30·8	12·7	12·2	0·7
1983	30·2	12·7	12·1	0·7

Dentists

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of payment claims made by dentists was reviewed in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; what was this percentage expressed in numerical terms; and how many were referred for further examination to the Scottish regional dental officers.

Mr. John MacKay: Every claim is routinely checked and all claims for complex and high cost treatment—currently about 100,000 or 4 per cent. of the total number years. This will not come from existing provision for Civil Service pay and related expenditure. It will be additional to existing departmental allocations but will be met from within planned public expenditure totals.

The Government will enter into immediate consultations with the Civil Service unions. It is also prepared to enter into discussions with the unions about the possibility of conducting further experiments at other grading levels. The method, timing and finance for such further experiments would all be for decision. But any such schemes identified and approved would be introduced as soon as practicable. The steps now announced will provide a basis on which the value and operation of performance-related pay arrangements in the Civil Service can be tested, and enable decisions to be taken in the light of the experience gained as to any long-term arrangements.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what would have been the gross weekly income required on 1 April to maintain the real disposable income of a single person, taking into account payment of tax, national insurance and 5 per cent. of earnings as superannuation contributions who on 1 April 1969 earned (a) £25, (b) £30, (c) £35, (d) £40, (e) £45, (f) £50, (g) £60, (h) £70, (i) £80, (j) £90, (k) £100, (l) £125, (m) £150, (n) £175, (o) £200, (p) £225 and (q) £250 per week;

(2) what would have been the gross weekly income required on 1 April to maintain the real disposable income of a married man with two children under 11 years of age, taking into account payment of tax, national insurance and 5 per cent. of earnings as superannuation contributions, and taking into account receipt of child benefit, who on 1 April 1969 earned (a) £25, (b) £30, (c) £35, (d) £40, (e) £45, (f) £50, (g) £60, (h) £70, (i) £80, (j) £90, (k) £100, (l) £125, (m) £150, (n) £175, (o) £200, (p) £225 and (q) £250 per week.

Mr. Moore: Information is given in the following table:

Gross weekly earnings 1969-70 £	Gross weekly earnings needed in 1984-85 to maintain the level of real disposable income of 1969-70
	Single man	Married man with 2 children under 11 years of age
25	134	127
30	162	155
35	190	183
40	219	212
45	248	241
50	273	267
60	322	316
70	375	366
80	435	422
90	495	480
100	558	540
125	699	685
150	835	824
175	971	962
200	1,091	1,088
225	1,176	1,173
250	1,249	1,251

Average male gross earnings (all occupations) in April 1984 were about 6·5 times higher than in April 1969.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during each of the last five years Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has collaborated with the police so as to enable a drugs courier to pass through control and proceed to a liaison with other persons; and under those circumstances how many persons have been arrested.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information is not readily available. On numerous occasions Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have successfully collaborated with police forces both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere to follow through an attempt to smuggle drugs, so that the principals involved were arrested.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the most convenient recent 12-month period, if he will show in table form the number of seizures by Customs and Excise officers of dangerous drugs, where possible distinguished by category and quantity, firearms, explosives and indecent and obscene articles.

Mr. Hayhoe: Apart from small quantities of items such as fireworks, of which no central records are kept, there were no seizures of explosives for the year ended 31 March 1984. The number of seizures of controlled drugs and the quantity of firearms and indecent or obscene articles seized in that year are as follows:

Item	Number of seizures	Number of items seized
Controlled drugs	3,841
Firearms		1,140
Indecent or obscene articles		170,921

The statistics given in this answer should not be taken as an indication of customs resources devoted to controlling the various classes of goods, the large number of indecent items seized suggesting an inordinate amount of effort spent pursuing them. Each detection of indecent material generally yields several items, sometimes running into hundreds or even thousands. This is not the case with firearms, where one detection normally produces only one or two.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Murphy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he is planning to have regarding mortgage tax relief; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: None.

Budget Council

Mr. Hind asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement about the European Economic Community Budget Council on 29 November.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council in Brussels.

The Council met a delegation from the European Parliament led by the President of the Parliament, M. Pflimlin, to exchange views on the Parliament's proposed amendments and modifications to the draft budget for 1985. Following this, the Council considered and voted on the Parliament's proposals.

The Council rejected the Parliament's major changes to the draft budget, which included proposals:

to place the United Kingdom's 1,000 mecu compensation for 1984 on the expenditure side of the budget, rather than as an abatement of our contributions, in contravention of the agreement reached at Fontainebleau:

to increase the agricultural provision by 1,300 mecu, thus taking the Budget beyond the 1 per cent. VAT ceiling; to make alterations relating to the revenue side of the budget.

With regard to additional agricultural expenditure, the Council agreed to make two memorandum entries, one on the revenue side and one on the expenditure side of the budget. That on the expenditure side included a figure of 1,315 mecu but the text makes it clear that it is not part of this budget, it does not therefore bear upon the 1 per cent. ceiling. The entry on the revenue side repeats the undertaking which the Council adopted in October to meet by 1 October 1985 the additiona budgetary requirements which will arise in 1985 including the obligations entered into vis-a-vis the United Kingdom as prescribed under the Fontainebleau agreement through a supplementary and amending budget, for which additionall funds will be provided.

The Council accepted a number of proposed amendments to non-obligatory expenditure. In particular, provision of 50 mecu was entered in the reserve chapter 100 for integrated mediterranean programmes and increases were agreed to several items of aid expenditure.

The Council agreed that, if necessary, it would hold a further meeting with the European Parliament in Strasbourg on 12 December.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Within the Treasury the European Community group of divisions deal exclusively with Community matters. The administrative expenses of this group represented about 0·6 per cent. of the 1983-84 total. An allowance should also be made for the work of other groups concerned to a lesser extent with Community matters. This figure could not be calculated without disproportionate cost.

Business Expansion Scheme

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the companies which currently have an approved fund established under the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Moore: [Pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984, c. 17]: The organisations which manage investment funds approved by the Inland Revenue for the purposes of the business expansion scheme are as follows:

Aberdeen Fund Managers Ltd.
Baronsmead Associates Ltd.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa (Aid)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to direct more of Britain's African aid programme towards increasing domestic food production.

Mr. Raison: We shall continue to help agriculture and food production, and are well aware of its importance, particularly in Africa. Much of our programme aid and technical co-operation, as well as our project aid, is already directed to this end. But it is important that these should reinforce sensible agricultural policies on the part of the recipient Governments.

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it its policy to support the use of the $200 million pledged to the International Development Association supplementary fund to support the World Bank's programme for action on Africa and the international fund for agricultural development.

Mr. Raison: There are many competing claims on the aid programme. We are discussing with the World Bank the best way to take forward its proposals on sub-Saharan Africa. If agreement is reached on a replenishment for the international fund for agricultural development, the Government would contribute on a basis to be decided following the usual consultation among donors.

EC (Food Aid)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek reforms of the European Economic Community food aid procedures.

Mr. Raison: We have been urging reform for some time and much progress has been made. The European Council approved a food aid management regulation in December 1982 which we have used to press for earlier decisions in the Council on total quantities to be made over the 10 years of designation. Similarly much of the investment in buildings and hence eligibility for capital allowances arises well in advance of the creation of jobs.

Thamesmead

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the future of Thamesmead.

Sir George Young: I have recently seen a press release about Thamesmead issued by the chairman of the GLC housing committee on 28 November. The chairman claims that the Government have forgotten about Thamesmead and have shown no interest in the area. The allegation is based on the absence of a specific reference to Thamesmead in the Local Government Bill.

The allegation is ridiculous. The Government have made it clear that we firmly support the early completion of Thamesmead as a balanced community. We granted the GLC a special allocation for the current year of £5 million for works at Thamesmead. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction have both visited the area in recent months, and I am visiting in January.

Our first preference for Thamesmead after abolition is that ownership should pass to a non-profit-making trust, a company limited by guarantee and using private finance but including full representation for local residents. I have made it absolutely clear, however, that there will be wide consultation with residents before any decision is taken, and that we will not seek to impose a trust if the residents do not want one.

Consultation will take place during 1985. If a trust is established, no special powers will be needed under the abolition legislation, as the GLC will be well aware from their knowledge of trusts which already exist and which they have visited. If the residents do not want a trust, Thamesmead will pass to borough ownership by order under the general provision in the Bill to transfer property consequent on abolition.

Far from having forgotten Thamesmead, the Government are convinced of the need to see the development successfully completed and of achieving whichever solution—a trust or borough ownership—best accords with residents' wishes. Neither alternative requires further provision in the Bill. There is no reason why the confidence of investors or residents should falter, and I am disappointed that by misrepresenting our position the chairman of the GLC's housing committee should choose to suggest otherwise.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Tuition Fees (Parental Contribution)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what payments have been made by parents towards student tuition fees and grants in cash and real terms in each year since 1954; and what is expected to be paid in each of the next three years.

Mr. Brooke: The figures in respect of mandatory awards are as follows:

Academic Year	Assessed parental contributions (£ million)	Index in real terms (1976-77=100)
Actual
1976-77	91	100
1977-78	92	87
1978-79	89	79
1979-80	84	63

1981-82	127	74
1982-83	155	85
Estimated
1983-84	165	86
1984-85	215	107

Comparable information for the period before 1976 is not available.

The estimated figures for the next three years are:

	Estimated figures
1985-86	250
1986-87	261
1987-88	273

Inner London Education Authority

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what criteria he has set the spending target of the Inner London education authority at the level of £900 million; and what factors he took into account when reaching his conclusion that spending projects proposed by the Inner London education authority are out of proportion to those of other such authorities with comparable problems.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment set the provisional target of the ILEA for 1985-86 at £900 million, and determined the expenditure level for the authority under the Rates Act 1984 at the same sum.

In the comments that I have made about ILEA's expenditure I have compared the spending on schools by the ILEA with that of the inner city partnership authorities outside London—Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester/Salford and Newcastle/Gateshead—which shows that ILEA's spending per head, after allowing for London salary weighting payments, is between 29 per cent. and 59 per cent. higher than that of these authorities. All these authorities have been designated as partnership authorities because of their difficult problems. The incidence of particular indicators varies, but overall I believe a fair comparison can be made between these authorities. ILEA has a larger ethnic minority population and a greater incidence of poor housing conditions than the other authorities. On the other hand, the percentage of children in families in receipt of supplementary benefit, the level of youth unemployment and of adult unemployment, and the percentage of children in households whose head is a semi-skilled or unskilled manual worker is higher in most of the inner city partnership authorities outside London that it is in ILEA.

Pupil Costs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the expenditure per pupil in secondary schools and in primary schools on books since 1980 expressed in cash terms and in 1980 cost terms; and what has been the expenditur per pupil on equipment since 1980 in cash terms and 1980 cost terms.

Mr. Dunn: The average expenditure per pupil by local education authorities in England, in cash and in 1979-80 cost terms, on books and on equipment in each of the four years to 1982-83, the latest year for which firm figures are available, is set out in the table:

Per pupil expenditure

	Books				Equipment
	Primary		Secondary		Primary		Secondary
	Cash £	Cost £	Cash £	Cost £	Cash £	Cost £	Cash £	Cost £
1979-80	4·4	4·5	8·0	8·0	9·5	9·5	19·0	19·0
1980-81	5·5	4·5	8·0	7·0	10·5	9·0	21·0	18·0
1981-82	6·0	4·5	8·5	6·5	12·0	9·5	23·5	18·0
1982-83	7·0	5·0	10·0	7·0	14·0	10·0	26·5	19·0

The expenditure in cost terms has been calculated using the GDP deflator.

Information Technology

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will report on the projected requirements of the information technology industry for graduate entrants, trained in information technology, in 1985; what is the number of students at present attending courses in information technology at universities expected to graduate in 1985; and what is the Government's proposed level of finance over the coming year for university departments of information technology.

Sir Keith Joseph: Detailed demand projections of the kind indicated cannot be made with any precision and estimates vary widely. The question of demand for graduates in the information technology field was, however, recently considered by a committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the Department of Trade and Industry. A copy of its first report is in the Library. In 1984-85 some 1,900 first degree students are expected to graduate from universities in electronics engineering, and some 1,500 in computer science. The Government do not fund university departments directly. Individual universities determine how to distribute between departments the grant allocation made to them by the University Grants Committee.

University Tuition Fees

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to fees charged for tuition by universities in each of the Euopean Community countries to British citizens who were not resident in the country in question prior to the proposed course of study.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend understands that all member states of the European Community with the exception of Belgium treat students from other Community countries on the same basis as their own students for fees purposes.

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what tuition fees British universities will charge in the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 to students who are nationals of European Community countries and who were not resident in the United Kingdom prior to their course of study.

Mr. Brooke: It is for universities themselves to decide what tuition fees to charge the students they admit. Under paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1983, nationals of European Community member states who can meet the specified ordinary residence requirements in the Community area are eligible to pay the home rates of fee at British universities. My right hon. Friend announced on 21 February this year that, for the academic year 1984-85, he had recommended fee levels for home and European Community students of £500 for first degree and diploma courses and of £1,569 for postgraduate courses. In giving details on 12 November this year of the Government's expenditure plans for education and science in 1985-86, my right hon. Friend announced that the cash available allowed for a tuition fee of £520 for home full-time and sandwich course students in courses designated for mandatory student awards. So far as postgraduate courses are concerned my right hon. Friend is recommending a fee of £1,632 in 1985-86 for home and European Community students.

Student Awards and Fees

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the levels of contributions required from parents to students' grants and university tuition fees in each European Community state; and how they compare with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: The student support arrangements of each European Community country involve a parental means test. Detailed information on the level of contributions is not available for the purpose of comparisons with the United Kingdom, but grant levels in the United Kingdom are more generous than in other Community countries.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Pesticides

46. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on reform of the law governing the distribution and manufacture of pesticides over the last six months.

Mr. Trippier: None.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Butcher: The number of visually handicapped staff has varied between 26 and 28 over the last four years. Of the 27 such staff currently employed, 20 are registered blind. It would be of disproportionate cost to obtain a similar breakdown for previous years.

Regional Aid

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect the recent changes to United Kingdom regional industrial incentives will have on the Community programmes sector of the European regional development fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the Community programmes under the non-quota section of the ERDF announced by my hon. Friend and Mr. Antonio Giolitti on 26 November. These programmes are not affected by the recent changes to United Kingdom regional industrial incentives.

Deprivation (Stoke-on-Trent)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the assisted areas in the new regional policy have a higher rate of deprivation than Stoke-on-Trent; and if he will tabulate in the Official Report which elements of deprivation are involved.

Mr. Trippier: Every assisted area under the map introduced on 29 November has a greater need for employment opportunities than the Stoke travel-to-work area. In assessing areas' relative need for current and future employment opportunities, our main criterion was annual average unemployment. Of the new AAs, only Dunfermline had lower annual average unemployment than Stoke. Other criteria included long-term unemployment, growth in labour supply, industrial and occupational structures, and economic activity rates. We also took account of the relative position of neighbouring areas.

Motor Vehicles

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a consumer's guide to new motor vehicles offered for sale in the United Kingdom, specifying the approximate proportion by value of British manufactures.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Steel Industry

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the restructuring of the steel industry in the European Community.

Mr. Norman Lamont: For a long time the United Kingdom led the Community in reducing steel capacity, and I am glad to be able to report that other member states are now matching and in some cases surpassing our efforts. The aim of the EC steel aids code has been to bring supply into line with demand so that the European steel industry can stand on its own feet, and the European Commission is now confident that the specific target of reducing hot-rolled steel capacity by 30 to 35 million tonnes per year by the end of 1985 will be achieved.

The progress being made in restructuring the Community steel industry is illustrated by the following table prepared by the Commission. It shows in particular that, between the beginning of 1980 and the end of this year, capacity cuts totalling 21·9 million tonnes will have actually been carried out.

	Capacity 1980	Minimum Required	'000 tonnes per year Reductions Identified	Closures actually carried out by 31 December 1984
West Germany	53,117	*6,101	†6,922	6,295
Belgium	16,028	3,155	‡3,183	3,182
Denmark	941	66	66	66
France	26,869	5,311	5,311	3,631
Italy	36,294	5,834	3,860	3,494
Luxembourg	5,215	960	1,045	1,045
Netherlands	7,297	950	1,432	82
United Kingdom	22,840	4,500	4,229	4,104
	168,601	26,786	26,048	21,900

* Not including Klöckner
† Including Klöckner
‡ Including 250,000 tonnes of capacity transferred from Luxembourg.

The Government will continue to monitor other countries' progress in carrying out their restructuring plans and will keep up pressure to ensure that they fulfil their obligations.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates (Newcastle)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General how many members of the present advisory committee on the appointment of magistrates for the city of Newcastle upon Tyne who are also justices of the peace (a) answered question 5(a) on the application form for appointment to the bench and (b) answered question 16 on the same application form; and what are the total answers in each category.

The Solicitor-General: All the members of the Newcastle upon Tyne advisory committee are justices. Half of these were appointed to the bench prior to 1967, before which date forms are not available. The forms were altered to their present form in 1979. Of the remaining half of the advisory committee three answered the question relating to religion (numbered differently on the older version of the form) as the Church of England, one as Roman Catholic, and one as "Committed Christian". In reply to the question on political opinions two were described as Conservative, two as Labour, and one as, in effect, uncommitted.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General what statistical information the advisory committee on the appointment of magistrates for the city of Newcastle upon Tyne possesses concerning the religious opinions and affiliations of the citizens of Newcastle upon Tyne.

The Solicitor-General: This information is not collected statistically.

Magistrates (Appointments)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General what is the publication date for the new edition of the notes on procedure as to how advisory committees for the appointment of magistrates should carry out their duties; and if he will make a statement regarding changes from the previous directions.

The Solicitor-General: The publication date for the new edition of the Lord Chancellor's "Directions to Advisory Committees" is not yet known. When available a copy will be placed in the Library.

Sentencing Policy (Newcastle upon Tyne)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of the Lord Chancellor's recent comments on the sentencing policies of the magistrates' bench in Newcastle upon Tyne.

The Solicitor-General: The Lord Chancellor's recent speech had no direct reference to the sentencing policies of the magistrates' bench in Newcastle upon Tyne as such. The entire speech was circulated to a number of national and professional journals, and to the Newcastle Journal, but I am arranging to send the hon. Gentleman a copy in the hope that he may find it interesting.

Auction (Bidding Agreements) Act

Mr. Faulds asked the Attorney-General whether he will refer to the Director of Public Prosecutions the circumstances surrounding the auction sale of furniture from the estate of Mrs. Elizabeth Dreyfus held by Messrs. Bruton Knowles in Gloucestershire on 19 July and ask him to initiate proceedings against those dealers who have contravened the Auction (Bidding Agreements) Act.

The Solicitor-General: There is no evidence before me which would justify referral to the Director of Public Prosecutions with a view to a request for inquiries by the police. The director has neither the powers nor the facilities to investigate criminal allegations. If the hon. Member or any other person is in possession of evidence tending to show a contravention of the Auctions (Bidding Agreements) Act 1927 or the commission of any other criminal offence the proper course is to place that evidence in the hands of the police.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Best asked the Attorney-General what criteria will govern the distribution of casework within the Crown prosecution service to be established by the Prosecution of Offences Bill; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: The fundamental principle underlying the management of the Crown prosecution service will be maximum delegation consistent with proper accountability. In the great majority of cases decisions on prosecutions will be taken locally. The Director of Public Prosecutions will promulgate within the service guidance on matters of policy and practice intended to produce a sensible degree of consistency rather than rigid uniformity. Crown prosecutors will have a wide measure of discretion and in reaching their decisions will take account of any relevant local circumstances as well as the general guidance given by the director.

The Attorney-General has today laid before this House a White Paper outlining the proposed initial distribution of functions between the headquarters and local offices of the proposed Crown prosecution service. As an interim measure pending the establishment of the new service it is also intended to revise the Prosecution of Offences Regulations 1978 so as to provide greater flexibility in the handling of cases reportable by the police to the Director.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Allowances and Taxation

Mr. Squire asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish for the tax years 1983-84 and 1984-85 the following information for (i) a single person, (ii) a married man without children, (iii) a married man with two children aged under 11 years, (iv) a married man with four children and (v) a two-child family where the wife is in paid employment: (a) the tax threshold at current prices, (b) the tax threshold at 1949-50 prices (index 1949-50=100), (c) the tax threshold as a percentage of average manual earnings, (d) tax-free income at current prices, (e) tax-free income at 1949-50 prices (index 1949-50=100), (f) tax-free income as a percentage of average income, (g) break-even point at current prices, (h) break-even point at 1949-50 prices (index 1949-50=100) and (i) break-even point as a percentage of average manual earnings.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish for 1983-84 and 1984-85 the following information for (i) a single person, (ii) a married man without children, (iii) a married man with two children aged under 11 years, (iv) a married man with four children: (a) the tax threshold at current prices, (b) the tax threshold at 1949-50 prices (index 1949-50=100), (c) the tax threshold as a percentage of average manual earnings, (d) tax-free income at current prices, (e) tax-free income at 1949-50 prices (index 1949-50=100), (f) tax-free income as a percentage of average income, (g) break-even point at current prices, (h) break-even point at 1949-50 sclerosis between his Department and overseas organisations; and what incentives he has provided for local health authorities and others to exchange information on multiple sclerosis with medical and scientific organisations abroad;

(3) what steps he has taken to monitor the progress of research into multiple sclerosis and the development of new treatments and therapies both in the United Kingdom and abroad.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is the responsibility of individual doctors, including our Department's professional medical advisers, to keep up to date with research and development, both in this country and abroad, relating to their particular fields of interest. This is done by keeping abreast of journals, by attending local, national and international conferences and seminars and meetings of professional bodies, by personal contact with other members of their specialty, and where appropriate by formal postgraduate training. We are confident that these established methods whereby medical and scientific knowledge is disseminated apply to developments in multiple sclerosis.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessments of the various needs of people with multiple sclerosis have been made in the last 10 years by his Department.

Mr. Newton: None. We have, however, just commissioned a national survey, one of the aims of which is to identify the needs of disabled people, including those suffering from multiple sclerosis.

Disabled People (Voluntary Organisations)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to encourage disabled people in forming and operating their own voluntary organisations in order to ameliorate their condition and thereby supplement the statutory services.

Mr. Newton: We already give encouragement to this important activity, and provide grants for several national disability organisations which foster such developments. Disabled people should also benefit from our general policy of promoting self-help activities by, for example, sponsoring the publication of "Working with Self-Help Groups: a guide for local professionals" (Bedford Square Press, 1984), and the small scheme of grants we are planning with the voluntary sector to support the appointment of local generalist development officers for self-help groups.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of recorded cases of tuberculosis each year since 1980 in each of the area health authorities in the Greater Manchester area.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Notifications of tuberculosis in the metropolitan county districts within Greater Manchester between 1980 and 1983 were as follows:

Metropolitan County Districts	1980	1981	1982	1983
Bolton	146	133	100	75
Bury	23	20	30	29

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Fowler: The proportion of the running costs of the Department directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

Computer Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what information he bases his conclusions on the financial savings which will accrue by amending shift patterns involving computer staff in his Department.

Mr. Newton: The savings are based primarily on recommendations and options identified in an organisation and methods review in 1982. Our proposals for more effective use of staff and computer equipment involve the use of fewer staff and provide for savings in overtime and shift disturbance allowances.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what level of costs has been incurred due to the advertising campaign initiated by his Department to inform claimants of the methods of drawing benefits during the course of the dispute involving computer staff.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) on 3 December at column 77.

West Midlands RHA (General Manager)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applicants for the post of general manager of the West Midlands regional health authority were shortlisted by the regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am told that five candidates have been interviewed by the RHA.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings he expects to make as a result of (a) changes in the way supplementary benefit board and lodging ceilings are set, (b) restrictions on local and lodging payments to young supplementary benefit claimants and (c) changes in the way supplementary benefit residential care and nursing home ceilings are set.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 20 November 1984, c. 120]: At this stage it is not possible to give precise estimates of the savings from the proposals announced by my right hon. Friend on 29 November, which are set out in a consultative document and have been referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee for consultation. We expect the savings to be of the order of £70 million in 1985-86 and somewhat higher in subsequent years.

Office of the Chief Scientist

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he established his inquiry into the functions of the office of the chief scientist in his Department; what are its terms of reference; when he expects it to report; and if he will publish the evidence submitted to it.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to his reply, 28 November 1984, c. 526]: I set up a review in August 1984 of my Department's research management arrangements relating to the health and personal social services. Its remit is to consider how best to implement the objective that research and development requirements for health and personal social services should be met from outside this Department, to the extent that that is not already the case. The review will identify the range of functions and facilities required to promote, commission, co-ordinate, execute and disseminate research and development in this field. It will make proposals as to how these functions and facilities can be most effectively undertaken and provided outside the Department, and will advise on how to carry out any functions which it is considered essential to retain within DHSS.

The review is due to be completed by February 1985 and I intend to announce my conclusions later in the year. Any evidence submitted to it can of course be made publicly available by its authors.

Social Security Advisory Committee (Reports)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of the Social Security Advisory Committee's reports listed in his reply of 25 October, Official Report, 726-8, to the hon. Member for Oldham, West were not implemented in whole or in part.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984, c. 625]: All the committee's reports have been implemented in whole or in part. A total of 21 reports on draft amendment regulations have been published, as listed in my answer to the hon. Member on 25 October. These have covered over 300 changes in social security legislation, some of which have referred to wider policy issues also covered in the committee's two annual reports. The overwhelming majority of proposals relating to draft regulations have been implemented, either directly or by meeting in other ways the point of concern which led the committee to make them. The major exception is that we did not accept the committee's recommendation (Cmnd. 9150 and 9155) to withdraw proposed housing benefit and related changes earlier this year; we did however make a number of important changes responding to the committee's more detailed comments and suggestions. Other proposals we have not felt able to accept, for reasons which are set out in the appropriate government responses to the committee, have included recommendations for extended rights of appeal on weekly payment of child benefit (Cmnd. 8453); reconsidering withdrawal of child benefit for certain young people in temporary full-time work (Cmnd. 8586); writing off unrecovered overpayments after the same period as for ordinary civil debts (Cmnd. 8656); withdrawing for further consideration a provision to restrict application of the lower rate of deduction from benefit in cases of voluntary unemployment (Cmnd. 8978); and certain modifications on single payments for hospital visiting, assistance with house repair and maintenance, and reimbursement of travelling expenses to local offices (Cmnd. 9296).

Of the benefit policy recommendations in the committee's first annual report, published in 1982, 10 out of 14 have subsequently been implemented in whole or in part: these were the preservation in real terms of supplementary benefit, family income supplement and child benefit; the restoration of the 2 per cent. shortfall in benefits; the restoration of child benefit to its April 1979 level; the restoration of the 5 per cent. abatement of unemployment benefit; the eradication of the invalidity trap; and the preservation of the real value of the supplementary benefit capital cut-off and the capital limit for supplementary benefit single payments. We have taken steps to improve the advice and information service given in local offices, and although the committee's recommendation to extend the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to all those unemployed for more than a year remains on the table, we have been able to go some way towards it by enabling unemployed people over 60 on supplementary benefit to claim the long-term rate immediately.

Of the new recommendations in the committee's second report, published in 1983, we have been able to abolish the household duties test for housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension through the introduction of the new severe disablement allowance, and as my right hon. Friend recently announced, we shall be making good the 5 per cent. abatement of invalidity benefit made in lieu of taxation. The remaining recommendations largely relate to matters that are under consideration in the current social security reviews.

Special Hospitals (Riot Shields)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if the specific training in the use of physical restraint recently begun at Broadmoor hospital will include training in the use of riot shields;

(2) if there has been any training involving the use of riot shields at any of the special hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 30 November 1984, c. 625]: Staff at Broadmoor hospital and Rampton hospital have taken part, on a voluntary basis, in approved training courses in the techniques of handling violent patients. These courses cover the use of polycarbonate shields in certain circumstances to avoid injury to the patient, to other patients, and to staff. Training already covers the planning of general routines and organisation at the hospitals, of individual patient programmes, and of patient-staff relationships, in a way that will normally avoid violent incidents arising. No polycarbonate shields are held at either hospital.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 6 December 1984

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Blind Persons (Employment)

Mr. Butterfill asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission, what information he has on the number of blind people who have been employed in the Palace of Westminster for each of the last four years.

Mr. Beith: No registered blind people have been employed by the House of Commons Commission in the last four years.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Trials (Statutory Time Limit)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce statutory time limits for the period from arrest to trial for those held in custody in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: There are no immediate plans to introduce statutory time limits in Northern Ireland. However, the Government are mindful of the need to reduce the delay in bringing cases to trial in Northern Ireland. We will watch with particular interest the field trials which it is proposed to mount in England and Wales to test the practicality and effectiveness of time limits. We can then consider whether such measures might be effective in Northern Ireland.

Short Brothers (Privatisation)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement about the Government's plans to privatise Shorts.

Mr. Hurd: The Government have decided that Shorts should in principle be a candidate for privatisation. We therefore intend to seek specialist advice about the feasibility, costs and benefits and other details of disposal including how best to secure employee involvement so that the Government can consider the question fully in due course. In deciding eventually whether to proceed to sell, the Government will in particular wish to give full weight to the importance of the company in the Northern Ireland economy as well as to its policy of spreading share ownership.

WALES

Adult Training (Loans)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is Wales' allocation of the adult training loans experimental scheme for 1985-86.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A consultation paper was issued on 12 November inviting views, by the end of January, on an experimental scheme of training loans. Decisions on such a scheme will be taken in the light of this consultation.

Self-employed People

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of self-employed people in Wales in 1981-82 and in 1983-84; and of these, how many in each case were self-employed in the construction industry.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Based on the biennial labour force survey estimates, the numbers of self-employed in 1981, 1982 and 1983 were 115,000, 118,000 and 121,000. No occupational breakdown is available on that basis. The latest information on self-employed construction workers relates to 1981 and is based on the census of population for that year which showed a figure of 16,290.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the numbers of unemployed (a) skilled construction workers and (b) unskilled construction workers in Wales in 1979-80 and 1983-84 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information is not available for the period after 1981. Figures for that and the preceding two years were as follows:

Unemployed workers whose last employment was in the construction industry

	Skilled	Unskilled
October 1979	1,392	697
October 1980	3,347	1,154
October 1981	5,289	2,116

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs were created in 1983-84 under the part-time job release scheme in Wales; how much cash employers in Wales received in 1983-84 in Wales; and how many jobs were created in Wales in 1983-84 under the job-splitting scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The part-time job release scheme was introduced in October 1983 and there was no take-up between that date and the end of the 1983-84 financial year. Fifty jobs were created in the same period under the job-splitting scheme.

Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many enterprise agencies exist in Wales; how many jobs currently exist in these agencies; what is his calculation of the number of jobs per agency; and what total cash the Welsh agencies received.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Eleven local enterprise agencies are now operating in Wales directly employing 65 people. They estimate that they have been instrumental in creating or safeguarding a total of some 4,400 jobs.

Information is not available about the total financial support for these agencies which receive funding from a variety of sources. Urban programme contributions during the current financial year amount to £135,900.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the financial share for Wales of the increase in funds for the enterprise allowance scheme; how many enterprise allowances are currently taken up in Wales; and what is his estimate of the number for 1985.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: At the beginning of April 1984 some 40 places a week were available in Wales and this was increased to about 65 a week in May. Next year the planned weekly rate is about 80. It is not possible to give a precise expenditure figure since expenditure depends upon the pattern of take-up, but we would expect that the share in Wales of the total expenditure allocation would be of the order of 6 per cent. At the end of October 1984, just over 2,500 people in Wales were receiving allowances under the scheme and we expect a total of about 4,000 entrants in 1985-86.

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the amount of cash currently available to Welsh local education authorities; which local education authorities currently receive cash under the training and vocational education initiative; and what additional sums will be available to Welsh local education authorities in 1985 and 1986.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In the present financial year Welsh counties are likely to spend on current and capital accounts about £680 million on education including meals and milk. All local authorities in Wales except Dyfed and South Glamorgan are participating in the technical and vocational education initiative. Details of the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86 and the level of capital resources for that year will be announced next week.

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the level of current expenditure on education by local education authorities in Wales for each year since 1978-79 in cash and cost terms.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows for local authorities' revenue expenditure on education excluding meals and milk:

£ million

	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Cash	344·7	393·8	481·5	534·3	574·3	*605·5
1983-84 Cost terms	585·4	572·0	589·7	595·0	599·6	605·5

The figures in cost terms have been calculated using the GDP deflator.
* Provisional outturn figure.

Rhymney Valley District Council

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the housing block allocation for Rhymney Valley district council in 1983-84, in cash and percentage terms, is represented by enhancement from capital receipts accruing in that year and from previous years, respectively and cumulatively; and if he will provide the equivalent information for the estimates for 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The capital receipts element of the housing allocation is determined only at the national level.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the housing block allocation for Rhymney Valley district council for 1983-84, in cash and percentage terms, was represented by expenditure on housing improvement grants; what is the equivalent information for the estimates for 1984-85; and if there is a limit on the proportions so spent by local authorities in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Provisional figures for 1983-84 show that Rhymney Valley district council spent £2·92 million—53 per cent. of its housing allocation—on improvement grants. The authority's forecast for 1984-85 is £2·9 million—66 per cent. It is for each authority to determine its own expenditure priorities in the light of the resources available to it.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the capital expenditure allocation for Rhymney Valley district council, specifically for housing, in cost and real terms, for each year since 1979-80, including the estimate for 1984-85 and using the latter as the base year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is as follows:

Housing Capital Allocation (£'000)

Year	Cash	At 1984-85 Prices
1979-80	5,260	8,004
1980-81	5,150	6,607
1981-82	3,650	4,258
1982-83	6,211	6,793
1983-84	5,465	5,725
1984-85	4,412	4,412

River Conwy (Tunnel)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest cost for the construction of a tunnel under the river Conwy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The current estimate of cost for the whole scheme from the Glan Conwy junction to Conwy Morfa is £130 million.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the pupil to teacher ratio for each year since school pupil numbers were at their highest level since 1954.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: School pupil numbers reached their highest level in 1976-77. For each year since then the information is as follows for primary, secondary and nursery pupils and teachers in service with LEAs:

	Number
1976-77	19·1
1977-78	18·8
1978-79	18·2
1979-80	18·1

PRIME MINISTER

Falklands War

Q4. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether the rules of engagement for attacking Argentine ships were changed on Friday 30 April 1982.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Farleigh Wallop

Q16. Mr. Hunter asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit the village of Farleigh Wallop, Hampshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Secretary of State for Energy (Speech)

Q17. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if the speech made by the Secretary of State for Energy on 20 November on unemployment represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 27 November 1984 at column 776.

Lewisham

Q25. Mr. Moynihan asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Lewisham.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Moynihan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 December.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 December.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 6 December.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy).

Education Act 1944 (Correspondence)

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Library the letters she has received from and sent to the hon. Member for Newham, South consequent to her answer of Tuesday 17 July, Official Report, columns 169-70 about the Education Act 1944.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Gibraltar

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Prime Minister whether it remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government not to change Gibraltar's relationship with the United Kingdom without the consent of the people of Gibraltar.

The Prime Minister: Yes. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary told the House on 28 November, the British Government will fully maintain their commitment to honour the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the people of Gibraltar, as set out in the preamble to the 1969 constitution. The agreement which has been reached has been welcomed by the Chief Minister as an honourable outcome. In our view, it is very much in the interests of both Gibraltar and Spain. Full opening of the frontier should bring positive consequences for the economy of Gibraltar.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total of all local authorities' committed expenditure for 1985-86 shown on forms HIP 2 which have been submitted to his Department.

Mr. Gow: Summaries of local authorities' HIP 2 returns for 1985-86 are available in the Library. These show expected commitments for 1985-86 of just under £1·5 billion.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons are classified as homeless in the following regions at the latest available date; the north-east, the midlands, the south-west and the south-east.

Sir George Young: The number of households found to be homeless by local authorities for the first half of 1984 was as follows:

Region	Homeless Households (000)
North	5·4
Midlands (East and West)	10·3
South-West	9·3
South-East (including inner and outer London)	27·1

Note:

1. This information is not collected for persons, nor for a particular point in time.
2. North-east is not recognised as a standard region.

Grant-related Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the maximum percentage change has been in England on local authorities' grant-related expenditure from one year to the next over the period 1981-82 up to 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: 72·1 per cent. for Oswestry district council between 1981-82 and 1982-83.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of staff which would be needed by the London residuary body to manage and service the Greater London council mortgage account.

Sir George Young: Under paragraph 10 of schedule 13 to the Local Government Bill it will be for the London residuary body to decide what staff it needs to discharge its functions, including its proposed responsibility for managing and servicing the GLC's mortgage account. I expect the body to give early attention to its staffing needs, as soon as it is set up after Royal Assent to the Bill, so that arrangements for the employees concerned are in place well before abolition day.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he is considering for the monitoring and control of staff levels in the joint boards he proposes to set up if the Greater London council and metropolitan counties are abolished.

Sir George Young: Clause 80 of the Local Government Bill enables my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to require the relevant joint authorities to submit to them manpower schemes for the first three financial years following the establishment of these authorities. We also intend that the staff of the joint authorities should come within the joint manpower watch arrangements.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council, he will take into account when assessing financial targets the impact on boroughs containing present Greater London council housing action or general improvement areas.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No decisions have yet been taken on the future of expenditure targets beyond 1985-86.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 15 November, Official Report, column 314, if he has asked the councils of the districts in which are located Greater London council seaside and country homes for assurances that they would maintain current standards of management and maintenance if, as proposed, the homes were transferred to the districts in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Sir George Young: I have announced that the financial basis of the transfer of ownership will enable the district councils to maintain the levels of management and maintenance expenditure they inherit on abolition. The levels adopted will be a matter for local decision. For the first time, however, the decisions will be taken by local authorities for which the tenants are electors, rather than by county hall in London.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council, he will adjust the block grant poundage schedule for London local authorities in respect of the expenditure on land drainage transferred to the Thames water authority, in a similar way to that which he proposes for the transfer of expenditure from the Greater London council to London Regional Transport.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government are discussing the details of the post-abolition block grant distribution system with representatives of the local authorities. No final decisions have yet been made.

Sheltered Housing Schemes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sheltered housing schemes are operated to full standard and how many not to full standard by each London borough; how many dwellings they involve; and what proportion of local authority stock in the borough they represent.

Sir George Young: Statistics on sheltered dwellings are provided to my Department each year by local authorities, by dwelling but not by scheme. The number given by each London borough for sheltered dwellings within its area, and the proportions of local authority stock they represent, were on 1 April 1984 as follows:

	Total LA Dwellings	Sheltered	Sheltered as Percentage of Total LA Dwellings
City of London	1,788	0	0·0

Planning Permission

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the number of unimplemented planning permissions in (a) London and (b) elsewhere.

Mr. Macfarlane: We do not collect this information.

Block Grant

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, on the assumption that the 1984-85 block grant for upper tier authorities is attributed to lower tier authorities in proportion to their rateable value, which lower tier authorities will receive less block grant in real terms in 1984-85 than they were receiving rate support grant in 1979-80.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The allocation of block grant from upper tier to lower tier authorities on a rateable value basis conflicts with the equalisation principles of the block grant system and would not provide a meaningful basis of comparison with grant entitlements received under the pre-1981-82 arrangements.

Tobacco Companies (Sponsorship)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department collects on the scale and cost of sponsorship for sport and other recreations by tobacco companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The sponsorship of sport by tobacco companies is restricted by a voluntary agreement between the industry and the Government. Under the terms of that agreement, tobacco companies are required to inform my Department, in confidence, of their annual plans for sports sponsorship, and any subsequent changes to them. Expenditure by tobacco companies on sports sponsorship is restricted under the agreement to the 1976 level with due allowance for inflation. Again in accordance with the agreement, the industry makes annual confidential returns to my Department showing their United Kingdom expenditure on sports sponsorship.

Greater London Research Library

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the future of the Greater London research library.

Sir George Young: There have been few recent representations, though the numerous responses to the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities", Cmnd. 9063, included references to this subject.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East of 27 November, Official Report, column 423, when he expects to make a decision on future arrangements for the Greater London research library.

Sir George Young: As soon as practicable.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the proportion of applicants on housing waiting lists in London who are pensioners.

Sir George Young: My Department finds is unprofitable to collect information on waiting lists because local authority policy varies widely. I am aware of some incomplete statistics published by the Greater London council.

GLC (Mortgagors)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the household income of Greater London council mortgagors.

Sir George Young: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with private sector lenders on their willingness to re-finance loans from the Greater London council mortgage account in the event of the Greater London council being abolished; and what information he has been given regarding the extent to which transferred mortgages will be re-financed.

Sir George Young: It will be primarily for the London residuary body to hold such discussions.

Radioactive Waste, Billingham

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many written communications have been received by his Department on the subject of proposals to deposit radioactive waste materials in the disused anhydrite mines at Billingham in Cleveland.

Mr. Gow: Approximately 13,200.

Public Sector Tenants

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to enable public sector tenants to see information about themselves which is held by their landlords.

Sir George Young: My Department has today written to the local authority associations, to organisations representing tenants' interests, and to other interested bodies, to seek their views about how such information can be made more readily available. Public sector tenants sometimes believe that their landlords' files contain misleading personal information. In this area, and subject to proper safeguards, they ought to be able to check that mistakes are not being made. A copy of the consultation letter is in the Library.

Enterprise Zones (Job Creation)

Mr. John Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost of creating a job in an enterprise zone.

Sir George Young: At this stage of the enterprise zones experiment, it is not possible to give a figure: the costs of providing the infrastructure in the zones are incurred mainly in the early years whilst the jobs follow

Wheelchairs

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the cost to his Department of providing an electric-powered wheelchair for indoor use in the present financial year; and how many such wheelchairs have been provided in each of the last five financial years;

(2) what is the cost to his Department of providing an electric-powered wheelchair for outdoor use in the present financial year; and how many have been provided in each of the last five financial years;

(3) how many disabled persons are in possession of two electric-powered wheelchairs, one for indoors and one for outside use, provided by his Department;

(4) what would be the cost to his Department of providing one electric-powered wheelchair suitable for indoor and outdoor use, which can be self-operated, in the current financial year;

(5) what plans the Government have to change the present rules on the provision of electric-powered wheelchairs to the disabled to provide only one wheelchair suitable for indoor and outdoor use which is self-operated.

Mr. Newton: The number of indoor electric wheelchairs and outdoor electric power-assisted pushchairs issued in the last five financial years is as follows:

	Indoor	Outdoor
1979-80	3,010	3,709
1980-81	3,723	3,732
1981-82	4,130	4,015
1982-83	4,982	4,166
1983-84	5,322	4,849

Figures relating to dual provision could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The Department does not provide occupant-controlled outdoor electric wheelchairs.

A detailed analysis of the costs of wheelchair provision is being made by a working party which is reviewing the services of artificial limb and appliance centres. A full separation of these costs is not at present available. We have no plans to change current arrangements for the provision of different kinds of wheelchairs, but the working party is considering the range of wheelchairs issued by the Department and when it has reported we shall study any recommendations it may make.

Board and Lodging Charges

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the maximum permitted board and lodging charge for a single person, not included in the categories of people mentally ill or people in nursing homes applied by his Department's local offices in Norwich (both offices), Yarmouth; Diss; Highgate, London; Finsbury Park, London; and Surbiton, Surrey, in 1983.

Mr. Whitney: The maximum limit on the amount of supplementary benefit normally payable to a single person, other than in a residential or nursing home, in 1983 to meet the charge for full board and lodging accommodation in the area of each of the offices concerned was as follows:

	Before November 1983 increase £	After November 1983 increase £
Norwich Chantry	50·00	72·80
Norwich Mountergate	50·00	72·80
Great Yarmouth	45·00	56·00
Diss	55·00	66·00
Highgate, London	60·00	90·00
Finsbury Park, London	85·20	90·30
Surbiton, Surrey	70·00	81·00

Health Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the overall and (b) the per capita spending on health in the United Kingdom, the United States of America, France and West Germany in 1983; and what percentage of each country's gross domestic product the overall spending represented.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Differences between the health care and health financing systems of the countries mentioned means that no precise comparisons can be made. Figures of this sort should not necessarily be taken to represent differences in provision. An OECD report, which is still in preparation, gives the figures from which total health expenditure, total health expenditure per capita and the share of each country's gross domestic product devoted to health expenditure can be calculated as in the table. Information later than 1982 is not available for the United States of America, France and West Germany.

Health Authorities (Ancillary Services)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all district health authorities that have contracts with private companies for catering or domestic services or laundry and the annual savings figures as compared with direct labour.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my replies to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 30 October and 30 November at columns 967 and 623-24.

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that where direct labour organisations win a tender for catering or domestic services or laundry the price quoted is the total paid by the relevant health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have given health authorities clear advice on the costs that should be included in the in-house tender. We believe this advice is being followed generally and we will investigate any case in which it appears that it is not. If the outturn cost of the service proves to be significantly higher than the estimated cost in the successful tender, we will require a new open tendering exercise to be carried out.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will assess the effect on the present level of supplementary benefit payable to pensioners of his proposed new regulations.

Mr. Whitney: I presume the hon. Member is referring to the changes to the rules for paying additions for special needs to people receiving the long-term rate of supplementary benefit, which came into effect from 26 November, together with an extension of heating additions for supplementary pensioners. I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 27 November at column 468.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many public sector tenants in Scotland are receiving housing benefit; of these how many are in receipt of full benefit; and what each of these figures represents as a percentage of the total number of public sector tenants in Scotland.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will take steps to ensure that every pensioner who qualifies will receive the Christmas bonus by Christmas 1984;

(2) in view of the withdrawal of poster RP2/84 entitled. "Your Christmas '84 Bonus," what arrangements are being made by his Department to ensure that pensioners know how and when they will receive their Christmas bonus;

(3) what was the reason for the withdrawal of the poster RP2/84 entitled, "Your Christmas '84 Bonus";

(4) what was the cost of withdrawing the poster RP2/84 entitled, "Your Christmas '84 Bonus";

(5) how many copies of the poster RP/84 entitled, "Your Christmas '84 Bonus", were printed; and what was the cost.

Mr. Newton: Arrangements have been made for the Post Office to pay the Christmas bonus to pensioners paid by order book, including those receiving payment on the stub of an expired book, during the week commencing 3 December. Pensioners paid annually and those paid four-weekly will also receive the bonus before Christmas. For some pensioners paid quarterly the Christmas bonus will be included with the next regular payment, which for some 20,000, people will be after Christmas.

The payment arrangements have been publicised by means of advertisements in national daily and Sunday newspapers during last week. It was decided not to display the usual poster because it did not accurately reflect the emergency arrangements which were necessary because of the industrial dispute at Newcastle. The poster was printed in two sizes—27,025 in A4 and 9,400 in A3 at a total cost of £2,600 including VAT. The cost of issuing instructions not to display it was negligible.

Pharmaceutical Industry

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the amounts spent on research by the pharmaceutical industry in each year since 1954; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information most readily available is given in the table. Figures relate to companies with sales to the National Health Service of over £2 million per annum (£1 million for years 1970-77); several also had significant export sales. The figures are for revenue costs of research and development on medicines in both home and export markets. Capital expenditure is excluded. Of the £1·3 billion spent on research and development in the years 1970-82 inclusive, £881 million was effectively reimbursed to companies in the price of medicines supplied to the NHS.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will assess the total costs incurred by the Government as a consequence of the incidence of multiple sclerosis;

(2) what funds he is making available specifically for the relief of multiple sclerosis; and how these funds are to be dispensed.

Mr. Newton: Statutory services for people with multiple sclerosis form part of overall health and social services provision, and it is not possible to identify the expenditure devoted to particular categories of disabled people.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he is satisfied that his Department are sufficiently aware of research which is being carried out in other countries into the cause of multiple sclerosis and the development of new treatments and therapy programmes;

(2) what steps he has taken to encourage the international exchange of information on multiple the light of advances in technology. The consultative document estimated total costs over a 20-year period of some £700 million, with cumulative net savings in staff and administrative costs of some £1,200 million. It is not envisaged however that the strategy will be fully implemented until the middle of the next decade and these figures must therefore be regarded as very broad estimates.

Asbestos-related Diseases

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many deaths have occurred in England and Wales resulting from asbestos-related diseases in the last three years; and what levels of industrial disablement benefits have been allocated to patients in hospital while receiving treatment for such diseases.

Mr. Newton: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the numbers of deaths from asbestos-related diseases recorded in Great Britain in respect of people known to have worked with asbestos and participating in the asbestos survey are:

	Number
1981	598
1982	619

* (latest information available).

When a person is admitted to hospital for treatment of an injury or disease for which he is receiving industrial disablement benefit, that benefit is increased to the 100 per cent. rate whilst he remains in hospital.

Family Practitioner Service (Review)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the review of the family practitioner service to be completed; and if he will make a statement about publishing its conclusions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We anticipate publication of the Green Paper in the early part of next year.

Social Security (Equal Treatment)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the specific action taken by each member state of the European Economic Community to comply with the requirements of Community directive 79/7/EEC on equal treatment in social security; if any countries have requested a deferment of the obligations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The most recent information on the action taken by each member state of the EC to comply with Community directive 79/7/EEC is contained in the "Interim Report on the application of directive 79/7/EEC of 19 December 1978 (COM(83)793 final)" issued by the Commission of the European Communities on 6 January, a copy of which is in the Library.

The implementation period for the directive expires on 22 December. Within a year of this date member states are required to provide the Commission with all information necessary to enable them to draw up a report on the application of the directive for submission to the council. When this final report on the application of the directive is published a copy will be placed in the Library.

Smoking (Health)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of deaths from heart disease he attributes to smoking in people aged under 45 years, under 65 years and in all age groups; what is the total number of such deaths he thus attributes to smoking in each of these age ranges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Total deaths from coronary heart disease are in the table. In its recent report "Health or Smoking?" the Royal College of Physicians estimates that perhaps 20 per cent. of deaths from coronary heart disease are related to smoking and that the risk is greater among smokers aged under 45.

Total deaths from ischaemic heart disease (international classification of diseases 410-414): 1983† England and Wales*

Age group	Number
Under 45	1,897
45 to 64	31,946
All ages	156,550

* Commonly referred to as coronary heart disease.
† Provisional.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of deaths annually from lung cancer he attributes to smoking; how many such deaths occurred in people under 65 years and in all age groups in the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In its recent report "Health or Smoking?" the Royal College of Physicians estimates that about 90 per cent. of deaths from lung cancer are attributable to smoking. In 1983 total deaths from this cause (international classification of diseases 162) in England and Wales are provisionally estimated to have been 11,021 in people under 65 years and 35,572 for all ages.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of acute beds in National Health Service hospitals and what total number of inpatient bed days per annum he estimates to be used by patients who are suffering from smoking-induced illnesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The estimated daily average number of beds occupied by patients suffering from diseases in which smoking is considered to be significant is as shown. However, it is not possible to estimate what proportion of the beds would be occupied by patients in whose cases smoking was a contributory factor.

Estimated average daily number of beds occupied in 1983 by patients with selected main diagnoses, NHS Hospitals in England

Diagnosis	International Classification of Disease codes	Estimated average number of beds occupied daily
Ischaemic heart disease	410-414	5,950
Malignant neoplasm of trachae, bronchus and lung	162	1,830
Bronchitis and emphysema	490-492	1,310
Other obstructive lung disease	496	880

Diagnosis	International Classification of Disease codes	Estimated average number of beds occupied daily
Total of conditions listed above		9,970

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the percentage of outpatients at chest clinics who attend as a result of smoking-induced illnesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983, there were 179,700 new attendances at outpatient clinics for chest diseases in National Health Service hospitals in England. It is not possible to estimate the proportion of patients who attend as a result of smoking-induced illnesses.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many amputations are carried out each year as a result of peripheral vascular disease caused by smoking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: An estimated 2,220 patients who underwent an amputation in National Health Service hospitals in England in 1982 were diagnosed as suffering from atherosclerosis and other peripheral vascular diseases. It is not known how many cases were smoking-related.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of premature deaths caused by the use of tobacco; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Royal College of Physicians estimates that at least 100,000 deaths occur each year as a result of smoking.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost to the National Health Service of smoking-induced diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The current estimated cost to the National Health Service in England and Wales of diseases attributable to smoking is about £120 million a year.

Drugs (Overprescribing)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has now received concerning the over-prescribing of a drug, the name of which has been supplied to him; how many complained of the side effects of the drug and of withdrawal symptons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have assumed that the hon. Member is referring to the drug Lorazepam, the constituent of Ativan. I have received no further representations about this drug since the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 31 October at column 1110.

Heroin

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of premature deaths caused by the use of heroin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information is not available centrally in precisely the form requested. The information in the table may be of help to the hon. Member. The Government will continue to give high priority to measures to combat drug misuse.

Number of deaths in England and Wales

Year	Morphine type* drug dependence	Morphine type* non-dependent abuse	Poisoning† involving heroin
1979	43	—	3
1980	43	—	9
1981	29	1	10
1982	58	3	8
1983	64	1	10

* Heroin, Methadone, Opium, Opium alkaloids and their derivatives, and synthetics with morphine-like effects.
† Accidental, suicidal or undetermined.

Drug Addiction

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost to the National Health Service of drug addiction.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These costs are not identified separately in the accounts of health authorities or estimated costs of family practitioner services.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of prescriptions for benzodiazepines issued by year during the last five years in the Merseyside regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Myasthenia Gravis

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of myasthenia gravis were diagnosed in each of the last three years; and what facilities are available for diagnosis and treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Detailed statistics on the incidence of this disease are not readily available. The estimated number of hospital discharges and deaths in respect of myasthenia gravis in National Health Service hospitals in England in each of the years 1980-82 (the latest available data) was:

	Number
1980	800
1981	740
1982	700

Facilities for diagnosis and treatment are available in all NHS regions.

Abortions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate why women who have abortions in National Heath Service hospitals are 17 times more likely to die from accidents during the operation than women who go to private clinics for this operation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I assume the hon. Member's question refers to recent correspondence in The Lancet. The correspondent who first raised the point subsequently amended the ratio of deaths following abortions carried out within the National Health Service and the private sector to 9:1 during the period 1968-82. In our opinion, the numbers involved are too small to calculate meaningful death rates or draw any conclusions about relative risk.

Dentists

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he makes of the extent nationally that dentists are paid for their services in cash; if he will take steps to reduce or eliminate this; and if he will require that receipts be made available for all payments by patients before fee or item payments are issued.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not aware of the extent to which patients pay National Health Service charges in cash. We would not wish to take any steps to reduce patients' choice to make such payments by whatever method they find most convenient. Dentists are required by their terms of service to give patients receipts for any NHS charges paid and to include on the form which they use to claim fees the amount of any charges received or being claimed from the patient.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much the Post Office measures to counteract the effects of his Department's strike at Newcastle is expected to cost up to the end of 1984.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

West Midlands RHA (General Manager)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many members of the West Midlands regional health authority interviewed the shortlisted applicants for the post of general manager of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The details of internal arrangements made by the West Midlands regional health authority for its members to consider the candidates are a matter for that authority. I suggest that the hon. Member should approach the chairman for the information he requires.

Social Security Advisory Committee

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is yet able to announce the chairmanship of the Social Security Advisory Committee.

Mr. Fowler: I am pleased to be able to announce that Mr. Peter Barclay, CBE, has agreed to serve as chairman of the Social Security Advisory Committee for a period of three years from 1 January 1985. Mr. Barclay, a senior partner in a London firm of solicitors, is at present chairman of the National Institute for Social Work.

DEFENCE

Forces (Free Mail)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on free mail for HM forces in the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) of 5 December at column 181.

Nimrod Airborne Early Warning Project

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimated cost of the Nimrod airborne early warning project; how this varies from the original estimate; when it is likely to be in service; if he is satisfied with progress towards its introduction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: On the progress of the project, I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 29 October at column 854. So far as project cost is concerned, as I told the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) on 15 November at column 346, it is our policy not to divulge information that is commercially confidential.

Airland Battle Concept

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the implications for British forces of the adoption by United States forces of the airland battle concept.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Lady to my answer to her of 15 November at column 349 in which I made it clear that airland battle is United States army, not NATO, doctrine, and that United States army forces will, like British forces, operate in Europe under NATO procedures and principles.

NATO

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the defensive nature of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation alliance influences force structures and tactical planning.

Mr. Stanley: NATO's deterrent strategy of forward defence and flexible response forms the basis of all its planning.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the role of 1st British Corps is influenced by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation strategy of forward defence.

Mr. Stanley: The planning and disposition of 1st British Corps on that sector of NATO's central region to which it is assigned reflects NATO's strategy of forward defence.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications for the battle role of 1st British Corps of the adoption by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation of the follow-on force attack doctrine.

Mr. Stanley: The adoption by NATO of follow-on force attack as a long-term planning guideline will not affect the role of 1st British Corps; consideration of any implications for the detailed conduct of that role will be part of the further development of long-term planning.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what alternative strategies to follow-on force attack have been considered by the North Atlantic Trety Organisation.

Mr. Stanley: NATO has adhered consistently to its defensive strategy based on forward defence and flexible response since its adoption in 1967. The long-term planning guideline follow-on force attack is consistent with that strategy.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what studies he has made of the implications for the level of reserves of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation adopting the doctrine of follow-on force attack.

Mr. Stanley: FOFA was adopted by NATO as a long-term planning guideline. Implications for the level of reserves is one of the many aspects to receive due consideration in the further development of long-term planning in this as in other areas.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what requirement for offensive action is envisaged in current North Atlantic Treaty Organisation strategy on the central European front.

Mr. Stanley: We have repeatedly made it clear that NATO is a defensive alliance, and that none of our weapons will be used except in response to an attack.

Government Policy

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the lectures given to the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies by General Sir Nigel Bagnall and Air Marshall Sir Patrick Hine on 23 May continue to reflect Her Majesty's Government policies, particularly as regards the role of British forces in Germany.

Mr. Stanley: The Government's policies are to support NATO's defensive strategy of flexible response and forward defence, a strategy reflected in both lectures.

Fleet Headquarters (Signals)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the normal practice at Fleet headquarters at Northwood for the recording and retention of signals sent from, and received by, flag officer submarines.

Mr. Stanley: Records of classified signals are kept by flag officer submarines in accordance with the normal rules for the security and handling of classified documents. Signals are normally destroyed after a month unless they are required, in which case they are usually placed on a registered file.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any of the original signals sent between HMS Conqueror and Fleet headquarters at Northwood in April and May 1982 have been retained.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any of the signals sent between HMS Conqueror and Fleet headquarters at Northwood in April and May 1982 were destroyed before November 1982.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any copies of signals sent between HMS Conqueror and Fleet headquarters at Northwood in April and May 1982 are retained in any form other than the war diary of flag officer submarines.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 3 December, if he will list the days between 16 June 1982 and 16 February 1983 on which signals documents relating to HMS Conqueror were destroyed, stating whether the document was (a) a signal originating from Northwood, (b) a signal originating from HMS Conqueror and (c) part of the signals log of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now list in a form which neither discloses tactical information nor prejudices current naval operations, the approximate position of each element of the Falklands task force at noon and midnight on 29 and 30 April and 1, 2 and 3 May 1982.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Defendants' Pleas (Statistics)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics his Department collects in respect of defendants' pleas on arraignment (a) before Crown courts and (b) before magistrates' courts.

Mr. Mellor: Information collected by the Department on court proceedings includes whether defendants pleaded guilty of not guilty when prosecuted for indictable offences at the Crown court or at magistrates' courts, and for some of the more serious summary offences at magistrates' courts. However, in 1980 the recording of this information was found to be inaccurate and despite subsequent efforts to improve the recording of plea, reliable information is not at present available from this source. However, I understand from my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor that his Department records the defendant's plea on arraignment at the Crown court and results are published annually in "Judicial Statistics" (tables 5.13 and 5.16 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9370).

Movement for London have expressed to me recently their concern about the ability of the Dartford tunnel to cope with expected M25 traffic flows. On this matter I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) on 3 December at column 34. No representations have been received from the National Chamber of Trade.

Driving Tests, Stoke-on-Trent

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has made arrangements for driving tests in Stoke-on-Trent to be held after a shorter waiting time if they are organised through particular driving schools than the normal waiting time for direct applicants for tests.

Mrs. Chalker: No.

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are being taken to reduce the waiting time for driving tests in Stoke-on-Trent; and when an improvement can be expected.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department is recruiting extra examiners. Some are due to be posted to Stoke-on-Trent. This should bring about an improvement in waiting times early in the new year. Examiners are also posted in temporarily from other centres to even out waiting periods throughout the traffic area.

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average waiting time for driving tests in England; and what are the minimum and maximum waiting times in Stoke-on-Trent.

Mrs. Chalker: The average waiting time for an L-test in England and Wales on 9 November, the latest date for which figures are available, was 18½ weeks. Waiting times at that date at centres serving Stoke-on-Trent were: Fenton, 20 weeks; Cobridge, 20 weeks; and Newcastle-under-Lyme, 28 weeks. This compares with an average wait in the west midlands of some 20 weeks. I am not satisfied with these waiting times, and the current recruitment of further staff will help to reduce them.

Cyclists

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what specific steps are being taken by his Department to ensure that road designers and engineers are considering the needs of cyclists.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department undertakes research into cycle facilities and publishes information for the use of road designers and engineers. Local advice on individual schemes is available through the Department's regional offices.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many child cyclists under the age of 15 years were (a) killed and (b) seriously injuried in road accidents in 1981, 1982, 1983 and to the nearest available date in 1984;

(2) how many cyclists were (a) killed and (b) seriously injured in road accidents in 1981, 1982, 1983 and to the nearest available date in 1984;

(3) what is the approximate number of cycling accidents which have occurred on (a) large roundabouts, (b) slip roads, and (c) busy main roads in the last three years.

Mrs. Chalker: The numbers of pedal cyclists killed and seriously injured in 1981, 1982 and 1983 and to the nearest available date in 1984 were:

	1981	1982	1983	1984*
0 to 14 years
Killed	86	76	87	41
Seriously injured	2,010	1,982	2,200	1,021
All Ages
Killed	310	294	323	152
Seriously injured	5,194	5,673	6,073	2,766

* January to June (provisional figures).

The number of cycling accidents which occurred on large roundabouts—mini roundabouts are not included—slip roads and main roads—motorways, A(M) and A class roads—for the last three years were:

	1981	1982	1983
Roundabouts	1,547	1,775	2,014
Slip roads	143	181	208
Main roads	10,929	12,508	12,995

Identifying busy main roads would involve disproportionate cost. An article on pedal cycle accidents is included on page 34 of "Road Accidents Great Britain 1983", a copy of which is in the Library.

Departmental Economies (Rewards)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has funds available within his budget for rewarding employees, or members of the public, for putting forward suggestions which result in the saving of costs.

Mr. Ridley: Funds are available under a staff suggestions scheme for rewarding employees whose suggestions improve the efficiency of the Department. There are no such arrangements for members of the public.

Trunk Roads

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to alter the public inquiry system in relation to trunk roads.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and the Environment will be considering whether any changes should be made in the light of the Civil Engineering Economic Development Committee's report on pre-construction procedures for motorway and trunk road schemes, which they expect to receive shortly.

Greater London Transport Survey

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is taking steps to continue the Greater London transport survey; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The Greater London transport survey of 1971 and 1981 were the responsibility of the GLC. On that pattern the next survey would not need to be carried out until 1991. It will be for the boroughs and the Secretary of State to decide, under powers being sought in the Local Government Bill, what survey arrangements will be appropriate in the London area.

Greater London (Motor Cars)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to restrict and restrain car use into Greater London.

Mrs. Chalker: I am not clear what steps the hon. Member considers would be justifiable to limit Londoners' car use or what powers he proposes should be used.

British Transport Police (Identification Parades)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the stations at which informal identification parades were conducted by the British Transport Police in each year from 1979 to September 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: Information covering previous years since 1978 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

British Rail (Public Service Obligation Grant)

Sir Philip Goodhart asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will adjust British Rail's public service obligation grant cash limit for 1984 to take account of the change of the board's annual accounting period from a calendar to fiscal year.

Mr. Ridley: Yes. The PSO grant cash limit normally covers a 12-month period. But British Rail is changing its annual accounting period from a calendar to a fiscal year basis with effect from 1 April 1985. I have decided, therefore, to extend the PSO grant cash limit for 1984 to cover the 15 months period from 1 January 1984 to 31 March 1985. The new limit for that 15 month period will be £1,088 million. This continues to reflect British Rail's progress towards achieving the 1986 grant target.

Road Traffic Growth

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to revise the forecasts of road traffic growth released in July 1980.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes. In the light of trends in traffic growth and economic factors, the national road traffic forecasts of 1980 have been revised. I am issuing the new set of figures today and have placed copies in the Library. The new forecasts show increases over the next 30 years in the overall rate of traffic growth previously forecast.

ENERGY

Coal Mining Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list in the Official Report the number of persons employed in the coal mining industry in each of the last five years.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures showing the total number of persons employed by the board and its wholly-owned subsidiaries are set out in the NCB's annual report and accounts. Figures given for the last five years were:

(end September)

1979:	294,906
1980:	293,940
1981:	279,207
1982:	266,315
1983:	246,835

The equivalent figure for 1984 is 222,022 (provisional).

The reduction in the number of persons employed in the industry in the last 11 years of Labour Governments was 227,130, which far exceeds 130,019, the reduction in the nine years of Conservative Governments since 1970.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the British delegation to the United Nations conference of the Committee of Disarmament in Geneva has had communications with representatives of other international committees in regard to proposals for a total chemical weapons ban in Europe.

Mr. Luce: Our delegations to the conference on disarmament and to the Stockholm conference on disarmament in Europe have made it clear in those fora that proposals for a chemical weapons ban in Europe do not represent an adequate or satisfactory alternative to the global ban we are pursuing in the Geneva negotiations.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards proposals at the United Nations conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva for the creation of a chemical weapon-free zone in Europe, in co-operation with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, while simultaneously continuing negotiations for a global chemical weapons ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 29 October at column 815. A European ban would be no easier to negotiate, and bring much less benefit than a global ban. We will not be distracted by the superficial attractions of a limited approach.

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government's view has changed on the signing of the law of the sea convention.

Mr. Rifkind: No. Our view has not changed. As I indicated in my statement to the House on 2 December 1982 at column 410, we have fundamental objections to certain aspects of the convention. We had hoped that there might have been improvements which would have enabled us to sign, but these have not occurred. We will not, however, stand in the way of signature by the European Community whose competence as regards the convention is limited.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme (Tameside and Stockport)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for the Stockport district the name and number of managing agents, the number on their schemes, by scheme, and the fees being paid to each managing agent under the youth training scheme in 1984-85 with a projection for 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The names of the 75 managing agents operating in the Stockport district, including those which are organised on a national basis, and details of numbers of youngsters currently in training, are:

Fees payable to managing agents will vary according to a number of factors. Each place included in a formal contract attracts a fee of £100. In addition, and provided certain current requirements are met, £39 per week is made available to the agent as long as a place remains filled.

No forecast is available at present of the size of schemes likely to be approved or the fees likely to be paid in 1985-86.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many accidents have occurred on the youth training scheme since the inception of the programme in the Stockport and Tameside districts, respectively.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The table shows the number of accidents on the youth training scheme which have been reported to the Manpower Services Commission's Greater Manchester east area office which covers the local authority districts of Stockport, Tameside and Oldham:

*Accidents	Period 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984	1 April 1984 to 30 September 1984
Fatalities	Nil	Nil
Injuries
Major†	2	1
Minor	11	4
Total	13	5

* MSC accident figures for YTS are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) on employed persons. However, MSC figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to HSE had the individuals been employed.

† Major injuries are classified according to the severtiey criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980.

Training and Job Creation

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will issue a booklet for the small employer, describing exactly what schemes are in operation for job creation; and how the employer can provide practical support for such schemes;

(2) whether he will introduce a special leaflet to explain the system of state help in finding training for and self-creating jobs for the 18 to 26 age group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Department and the Manpower Services Commission maintain a range of explanatory publications and leaflets aimed at employers and individuals, whether employed or not, describing those schemes and programmes which could be of use to them according to their circumstances. A number of these publications cover more than one type of assistance where appropriate. We therefore have no immediate plans to increase the range of existing publications as my hon. Friend suggest but the situation is kept under constant review, and if he has any suggestions we would be glad to hear from him.

Health and Safety

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average fine paid by firms violating the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act in 1982, 1983, and to the latest available date in 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The table shows the average fine paid by firms convicted under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act for prosecutions brought by Her Majesty's Factory Inspectorate.

Year	Average fine £
1982	377
1983*	371
1984*†	480

* Provisional.
† January to October.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many firms have been fined for violations of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act in 1984 to the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During the period 1 January to 30 October 1984 there were 347 firms prosecuted by HM Factory Inspectorate and were fined under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act.

Farm Machinery (Accidents)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers were (a) killed and (b) seriously injured in accidents involving farm machinery in 1981, 1982, 1983 and to the latest available date in 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information is given below on the number of workers reported killed or seriously injured in accidents involving farm machinery during the last three years and during 1984 so far.

	1981	1982	1983	1984*
Fatal Accidents	19	13	15	7
Serious Injuries	Not readily available	212	211	90

* (Provisional).

Coal Miners (Accident Statistics)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the number of coal miners who have been (a) killed and (b) injured at work in each of the past five years to the latest date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is as follows:

	Fatal*	†Reportable Serious Injuries
1979	46	473
1980	42	512
1981	35	815
1982	38	865
1983	30	824
1984†	18	240

Notes:
* Including deaths as a result of injuries sustained up to 12 months earlier.
† A comparison of reportable serious injury figures prior to 1981 with subsequent years is not valid as there was a change in the definition of reportable accidents on 1 January 1981.
‡ Provisional to 17 November 1984.

In addition to the serious injuries reported to the Health and Safety Executive statistics from the National Coal Board and the business statistics office for other accidents resulting in absence of more than three days are as follows:

	Number
1979	40,329
1980	36,221
1981	30,265
1982	24,110
1983	18,592
1984	Not available

Liverpool Skillcentre

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what will be the implications for employment of his plan to close the Liverpool skillcentre; how many instructors will be made redundant; what will be the savings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Wages Councils

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many establishments in England, Wales and Scotland, respectively, are covered by wages councils; and how this figure compares with the number in each year since 1977.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table and relates to the number of establishments on the Wages Inspectorate's register.

Number of establishments

	England	Wales	Scotland
1977	353,093	22,273	43,211
1978	353,939	22,214	42,352

1982	328,449	21,359	39,902
1983	330,574	22,067	38,630

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers in the United Kingdom are covered by wages councils; and if he will show how this figure has altered over the past seven years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on 21 June 1984 at column 249-52.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of workers in Scotland whose wages are governed by wages council legislation; if he will give a breakdown by wages council sector; and if he will show the number of workers in each regional or district council, whichever is most convenient.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Estimates of the number of workers in scope of wages councils are only available for Great Britain as a whole.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table covering the last 10 separate years which shows the number of complaints made in England, Wales and Scotland, respectively, to the Wages Inspectorate about employers paying under the statutory rates set by wages councils; and if he will show the number of prosecutions and the number of convictions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures requested are given in the following table:

	1974	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Labour Statistics

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Employment why he has changed his practice in respect of answering questions relating to statistics on unemployment; if he will now make it his practice to publish in the Official Report the details sought by hon. Members on unemployment statistics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I wrote to the hon. Gentleman about this subject on 19 October and apprised him of the arrangements made to provide prompter, comprehensive access by hon. Members to unemployment statistics. One consequence is that parliamentary written questions seeking information which could be obtained from the computer data base through the House of Commons Library will be referred to the Library.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales have agreed that similar arrangements shall apply in respect of unemployment statistics relating to their areas, and to adopt a similar practice with regard to parliamentary questions. They have already written to all Members with constituencies in Scotland and Wales respectively. Detailed information on Northern Ireland will continue to be provided as at present by the Northern Ireland Office.

The new arrangements include a computer databank of the relevant information, including information back to June 1983 for parliamentary constituencies, local authorities and the new travel-to-work areas. A terminal link is now available in the House of Commons Library. This facility will provide more convenient and speedier access to data previously only available through this Department.

The new system is being introduced in stages. Until the middle of 1985, data available through the terminal will relate only to parliamentary constituencies, local authority districts, counties, travel-to-work areas and job centre areas as well as national and regional figures. Disaggregation by age and duration of unemployment will not be initially available for parliamentary constituencies, local authority districts, or new travel-to-work areas. By the middle of 1985, however, individual ward data will be available, thus information will be available via the computer for any area capable of definition in terms of local authority wards. Simple analyses, for example, ranking areas, are also available.

Community Scheme

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to permit the Manpower Services Commission to transfer places on the community scheme from areas where the take-up is less than 100 per cent. to areas such as Barnsley and district where the scheme is oversubscribed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This has already been done, and I refer the right hon. Member to my statement on 26 March at column 29, which outlined out plans for a regional allocation of places on the community programme up to October 1986.

Wages Inspectors

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown of the number of wages inspectors employed in England and Wales and Scotland, respectively, for the current year and for each of the past seven years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table:

	Outdoor inspectors in post
	England	Wales	Scotland
October 1978	124	6	13
October 1979	138	7	15
October 1980	134	6	15
October 1981	100½	5	12
October 1982	98	5	13
October 1983	99	4	13
September 1984	97	5	13

In Wales and Scotland all inspector posts are currently filled. In England five vacant posts are in the process of being filled.

SCOTLAND

Housing Finance

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what was the total amount of income to local authority housing revenue accounts from housing support grant, rate fund contributions, rents and other sources, respectively, in 1984-85;

(2) what was the total amount of local authority housing revenue account expenditure in Scotland on loan charges, supervision and management, repairs and maintenance, respectively, in 1984-85;

(3) what was the total amount of local authorities' rate fund contribution to their housing revenue accounts in Scotland in 1984-85; and what was the average amount of rate fund contribution to the housing revenue account per council tenant in that year.

Mr. Younger: The latest available information is contained in section 5 of "Rating Review, Part 1, Estimates of Income and Expenditure 1984-85," published by the Scottish branch of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the total income in local authorities' housing revenue account in Scotland came from rents, housing support grant and rate fund contributions, respectively, in 1979-80, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Younger: The information for each year since 1979-80 is as follows:

Year	Rents	Housing Support Grant	Rate Fund Contributions	Other Income
	per cent.	per cent.	per cent.	per cent.
1979-80	44	39	14	3
1980-81	45	37	13	5
1981-82	55	25	16	4
1982-83	62	16	18	4
1983-84	67	11	18	4
1984-85	70	8	18	4

1979-80—1983-84 Local authority returns to Scottish Development Department.

1984-85—Rating Review, part 1 (June 1984), published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, Scottish branch.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total housing support grant paid to Scottish local authorities in 1984-85; and what was the average amount of housing support grant per council tenant in that year.

Mr. Younger: Under the Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1984, grants totalling £52·5 million have been apportioned to appropriate local authorities in respect of expenditure in 1984-85. On the basis of local authority returns of housing stock, this is an average amount of £61 per council house. Housing support grant is paid in respect of property not tenants.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are drawing unemployment benefit in Scotland and have not worked since leaving school at the latest convenient date; and what is the comparable total on the same date in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to my letter of 22 October. Information for Scotland on claimants who have not entered employment since completing full-time education is available in the House of Commons Library. However, apart from the figures for under-18-year-olds —for which adjustments have been made at the all-Scotland level—some of the statistics are not directly comparable because of the change from a registrant to a claimant based count in October 1982.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of people in Scotland who have been out of work for 52 weeks or more at the latest convenient date; and what was the comparable total on the same date in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to my letter of 22 October. This information is available in the House of Commons Library, although the figures are not directly comparable due to the change in the basis of the count in October 1982.

Student Grants

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has sent to the principal of Herriot-Watt university in answer to letters he has received from him concerning the proposed measures relating to students' grant allocations.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has received one letter from the principal of Heriot-Watt university about the Government's proposals in respect of students' allowances in 1985-86, but has not yet had the opportunity to reply to him. He will, however, do so shortly.

Fines

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of persons admitted to prison in Scotland for the non-payment of fines in the latest year for which figures are available; what percentage they were of the total number of admissions of convicted prisoners; and what was the average sentence served by those admitted for non-payment of fines in that year.

Mr. Younger: In 1983, there were 9,329 persons received into penal establishments in default for payment of fines. This represented 46 per cent. of persons received under sentence. Information on the average sentence served by those admitted in default of payment of fines is not available; but the average sentence imposed for this reason was 22 days.

Prisoners

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of prisoners admitted to Scottish prisons in the latest year for which figures are available who were sentenced to periods of three months and 30 days or less, respectively; and what percentage this was of the total number of admissions of prisoners serving sentences in that year.

Mr. Younger: The information is as follows:

Length of sentence	Adult	Under-21
(1) Total	7,925	1,463
(2) 30 days/one month or less	1,690	173
(3) 90 days/3 months	1,718	375
(2) and (3) as percentage of (1)	43	37

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the scale of payments made in terms of section 17(2) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1982 or other legislation to prisoners released or about to be released from Scottish prisons; and if he will give the total sum so disbursed for the latest convenient period for which figures are available and the average payment per prisoner during that period.

Mr. Younger: The rates of discharge grant currently paid are as follows:

Homeless inmates	58·35
Inmates returning home:
Aged over 18	24·55
Aged under 18	16·50

The total sum disbursed for this purpose in the finacial year 1983-84 was £352,315. Details of the average payment per prisoner eligible for a discharge grant are not available.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if a prisoner serving a sentence for the non-payment of a fine is entitled to remission on that sentence for good conduct.

Mr. Younger: A fine defaulter serving a term of imprisonment of more than five days may be granted remission of part of his term of imprisonment not exceeding one third of that term on the ground of his industry and good conduct.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has had with the European Commission, following changes in the assisted areas map, about the eligibility of parts of Scotland and in particular the Highlands and Islands for European regional development fund aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 3 December at column 42, the recent changes to the assisted area map have not affected the eligibility of the board's area for European regional development fund assistance. This has been accepted by officials of the Commission.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce statistics for the assisted places scheme in the current school session in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: At the beginning of the current school session there were 2,173 pupils receiving assistance under the assisted places scheme. Additional pupils will be admitted to assisted places throughout the 1984-85 school session.

Of the 2,173 pupils now in the scheme, 1,222—56 per cent.—are attending a fee-paying school prior to taking up an assisted place. The corresponding proportion for the new intake of pupils joining the scheme at the beginning of the current school session was 53 per cent.

Lower income families continue to benefit substantially from the scheme. In 1984-85, 1,132 pupils—53 per cent. of those in the scheme—will be receiving full fee remission because they have a family income of £6,046 per annum or less. A further 202 pupils—9 per cent.—have family incomes between £6,047 and £7,000 per annum and 250—12 per cent.—between £7,001 and £8,000.

Scottish Development Agency

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report past and present Scottish Development Agency investments in companies in each of the Scottish constituencies.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 372]: Information on SDA investment expenditure in each Scottish constituency is contained in the following table:

SOCIAL SERVICES

Rent and Rate Rebates

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are in receipt of rent and rate rebate but not supplementary benefit at the latest count.

Mr. Newton: Standard housing benefit is payable to claimants not in receipt of supplementary benefit. It is estimated that as at autumn 1983, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of households in Great Britain receiving standard housing benefit was as follows:

	Number
Rent rebate	1,830,000
Rent allowance	390,000
Rate rebate	3,660,000

These figures are not cumulative. A claimant in receipt of a rate rebate may also be in receipt of a rent rebate or a rent allowance. I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on 29 November at column 570 for information on those receiving help with both rent and rates.

Claimants (Industrial Disputes)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been spent by his Department in each of the past five years, in cost terms, on advising claimants about the effects on their entitlements of industrial disputes.

Mr. Newton: Advice is given to claimants about the effects of industrial disputes on their entitlements by the publication of leaflets and forms, through liaison with trades unions, local organisations etc. and in response to specific inquiries from individuals. I regret that the total cost of providing this information is not available but the cost at 1983 prices of printing the leaflet SB2 (Supplementary Benefit and Trade Disputes) in each of the past five years was as follows:

1979	2,400
1980	4,000
1981	—
1982	7,000
1983	3,400

Pharmaceutical Industry

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are employed in the pharmaceutical industry; what is the current value of pharmaceutical exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The estimated number of people employed in the United Kingdom pharmaceutical products industry (standard industrial classification 2570) at September 1984 was 82,300. Earlier published figures related to a different classification and are not, therefore, comparable.

In 1983 the value of export trade in medicinal and pharmaceutical products as defined in United Nations standard international trade classification 54 was £1,073 million. In the first nine months of 1984 export sales totalled £876 million.

Public Duties (Payments)

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the treatment of payments made to people who are in receipt of state benefits, including local authority councillors, for carrying out public duties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: There have been four representations in recent months about the fact that these payments are treated as earnings for social security benefit purposes. We have no proposals for changing the position.

Social Security (Costs)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the estimated total costs of administering social security; how many social security staff are employed by his Department; what are the estimated savings in staff and administrative costs as a result of computerisation; how long it will be before computerisation is complete; and what is the estimated cost of the whole computerisation programme.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated annual cost of administering the social security programme—including unemployment benefit which is administered by the Department of Employment on behalf of the Department—is some £1·5 billion for 1983-84. The number of staff engaged in the work is about 106,000, including about 28,000 in the Department of Employment.

Our plans for the application of new technology to social security were set out in the consultative document "Social Security Operational Strategy—A Framework for the Future", published in 1982. The operational strategy is not a single project but a technical and managerial framework within which new projects will be developed and existing systems maintained and updated in prices (index 1949-50=100) and (i) break-even point as a percentage of average manual earnings, in the light of the latest information on earnings levels.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 November 1984, c. 579]: The information is in the table.

Assumption on changes in price and earnings levels in 1984-85 are consistent with the "Autumn Statement 1984". In particular, earnings are assumed to increase by 7½ per cent. over 1983-84 in line with the underlying rate of increase assumed by the Government Actuary in his recent report.

Development Land Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the percentage of time district valuers devote to work in connection with development land tax valuations and associated matters.

Mr. Moore: Yes, about 3 per cent. This figure includes time spent on such associated matters as administration, management and training.

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he will estimate the percentage of the total yield from development land tax that is collected through deemed disposals.

Mr. Moore: The percentage collected through deemed disposals is probably in the region of 15 per cent., but the information on which to base a precise estimate is not readily available.

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate what additional revenue is received from the development land tax that would not otherwise have been collected through corporation or capital gains tax; and if he will express the cost of collecting development land tax as a percentage of that additional revenue.

Mr. Moore: The information on which to base a precise estimate is not available but the additional current revenue received could be in the region of £50 million. The estimated cost of collecting development land tax is 10 per cent. of that additional revenue. Some of that cost would remain if the tax were collected through other taxes.

Freeports

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement on progress towards the establishment of freeports.

Mr. Hayhoe: The six experimental free zones announced on 2 February at column 411 were designated by Treasury orders, which came into operation on 6 August. They are free to begin trading on completion of satisfactory security arrangements. The zones at Southampton and Liverpool have now opened.

Employers (Tax Concessions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional costs which would fall on employers in the event of reduction of pension scheme tax concessions and the removal of tax benefits.

Mr. Moore: Any additional costs would depend on the extent of any reduction in relief and on the individual circumstances of each pension fund.

Take-away Food (Value Added Tax)

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the effect on the take-away food industry of the imposition of value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Glyn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the revenue from the imposition of value added tax on take-away foods; and what assessment he has made of the impact of the tax on (a) sales and (b) profits.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to my answer on 12 November to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) at column 89.

The limited information available suggests that during the first few months of VAT on hot take-away food, the overall level of sales by small catering businesses was slightly down on the same period in 1983. Although some businesses have fared less well than others, it is impossible to say to what extent this is due to VAT rather than to other factors. There has been substantial real growth in the take-away food industry in recent years, and this long term trend can be expected to continue.

Cigarettes

Mr. Pavitt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how much extra revenue in real terms the Treasury would receive in a full year from an increase in taxation imposed by the next Budget of 5p, 10p, 15p, 20p and 25p, respectively, per packet of 20 cigarettes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimated net revenue changes, at 1985-86 prices, are:

Change in price of 20 cigarettes (pence)	Full year revenue yield (£ million)
5	160
10	320
15	475
20	625
25	770

For the larger price increases the estimates are subject to considerable margins of uncertainty.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the number of cigarettes sold in the United Kingdom in 1983 and his estimate for the number which are likely to be sold in 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Official statistics of cigarette sales are not collected. However, according to Customs and Excise returns, 102·6 billion cigarettes chargeable with excise duty were cleared for domestic consumption in 1983.

No estimate is available for 1984 as projections for cigarette clearances are not made.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the stamp duty payable by off-market dealers in unlisted securities.

Mr. Moore: The Board of Inland Revenue is advised that as the law stands securities dealt in on the unlisted securities market are not listed securities for the purpose of section 100(4)(b) of the Finance Act 1980. Until further review, where such stock is transferred to a qualified dealer full ad valorem duty will not normally be payable. The Board of Inland Revenue will be issuing a statement of practice to this effect.

TRANSPORT

Experimental Road Surfacing Materials

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the experimental road surfacing materials which are in use on roads for which he has responsibility; and what assessment has been made of their effectiveness.

Mrs. Chalker: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory has 153 lengths of experimental surfacing under observation on heavily trafficked roads. The influence of different types and proportions of bitumen —including additives such as organic polymers—stone and sand on road performance is being assessed in terms of resistance to skidding and rutting, riding quality, tyre noise and, with certain special materials, spray reduction. Formulations of 11 proprietary surfacing materials are included.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the assessment by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory of the use of an experimental road surfacing material on the A1 the name of which has been supplied to him.

Mrs. Chalker: Five variants of the proprietary material, the name of which has been supplied, were laid on A1 in 1975 alongside eight other non-proprietary surfacings. Measurements indicated that the surface texture, required for high-speed skid resistance, of the sections surfaced with the named material was lower than that specified by DTp and did not increase with time. The material did, however, provide good riding quality for rather longer than a standard bitumen macadam surfacing, but at a higher first cost. Results of the assessment have been published in TRRL supplementary report SR476.

Level Crossings

Mr. Mark Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he is satisfied with the progress being made in the conversion of the miniature warning light equipped level crossings to other means of control; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many level crossings on public roads are still controlled by the miniature warning light system.

Mr. David Mitchell: There are currently 42 level crossings on public roads which are equipped with miniature warning lights (MWL) and 58 on private roads. The main feature of this form of protection is that the user operates the barrier or gate himself, with the MWL giving a warning of the approach of a train. When these crossings were first introduced the conditions of suitability were that the road usage was to be light and essentially local in character, so that most of those using the crossing would be familiar with it.

Following an accident at Naas crossing in 1979, the railway inspectorate reviewed all the MWL crossings. Whilst recognising that at most locations the original conditions still applied, the inspector recommended that no more should be installed on public roads, and none has been. He further recommended that existing ones should, in the long term, be converted to other forms of protection.

At the time of publication of his report, in mid-1981, six crossings had been identified as being no longer fully suitable for MWL. At two the road usage was no longer light or local: these two crossings have been converted. Plans to convert the other four are well advanced; most will be done during 1985. It is the Railways Board's view, shared by the inspectorate, that there is no cause to divert funds to the wholesale conversion of MWL crossings from work on crossings whose modernisation is being given a higher priority.

Dartford Tunnel

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from representatives of the Automobile Association, the National Chamber of Trade, the Confederation of British Industry and the Movement for London in relation to future traffic circulation making use of the Dartford tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Representatives of the Automobile Association, the Confederation of British Industry and

	1983-84 (Actual)	1984-85 (Forecast)

* Excludes expenditure on Brucellosis eradication incentives (£1·9 million in 1983-84 and £0·8 million in 1984-85) and on horticultural protected crops adaptation aid (0·6 million in 1983-84).

Market Regulation (Expenditure)

Mrs. Roe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide details of expenditure in 1983-84 and 1984-85 by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce and the agricultural departments on market regulation under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: Details are given of the outturn for 1983-84 and the latest forecast of outturn for 1984-85:

	Outturn 1983-84 £ million	Latest forecast of outturn 1984-85 £ million
(i) Expenditure by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce
Cereals	120·8	357·8
Beef and Veal	263·9	322·5
Pigmeat	−14·8	−10·1
Sugar	53·2	63·1
Processed Products	28·3	32·9
Milk Products	561·3	333·0
Oil Seeds	87·2	54·6
Sheepmeat	158·3	123·1
Others	21·0	29·2

(ii) Expenditure by the Agricultural Departments
Milk Non-Marketing Premiums	13·3	12·7
Suckler Cow Premium Scheme	15·7	27·8
Annual Premium on Ewes	66·3	77·5
	95·3	118·0
Grand Total	1,374·5	1,424·1

Expenditure includes the beef and sheepmeat variable premium schemes—net of clawback for sheepmeat and charges on beef exported and sold into intervention—the premium schemes for the non-marketing of milk and the conversion of dairy herds, suckler cow premium scheme, annual premium on ewes, refunds on imports and exports, net of levies, the butter and school milk subsidies, and the net cost of buying commodities into intervention less proceeds from sales. It also takes account of certain receipts treated as negative expenditure, namely, monetary compensatory amounts levied on intra-Community trade and the co-responsibility and supplementary levies on milk producers. Of the estimated outturn for 1984-85 £1,087·1 million is expected to be financed from the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund (EAGGF), the balance being financed from Exchequer funds. In 1983-84 £1,132·9 million was financed from EAGGF. Some of the expenditure shown above benefits consumers and trade interests rather than United Kingdom producers.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Loyden asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the amounts of foodstuffs currently being stored in the European Economic Community under the intervention policies of the common agricultural policy and the cost of storing those foodstuffs.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest information on Community intervention stocks and the amounts set aside to meet the costs of holding stocks in the 1984 Community budget are set out below. It must be emphasised that the budget figures cover the whole of 1984 and do not relate solely to the current level of stocks.

Beef	143	16 November 1984	17

* As provided for in 1984 Supplementary and amending budget.
† Figures not available because budget does not identify expenditure in this sector in sufficient detail.

Seal Population (North Sea)

Mr. John Townend asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has of the seal population in the North sea; what information he has as to the gross food requirement of the seal population there; and what information he has as to the amount of fish destroyed but not consumed by the seals.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply and will do so as soon as possible.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Winnick asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will state the locations in London and the west midlands where the intervention stores for surplus EEC agriculture produce are sited and the amount of food stored, broken down into each class of produce; and how long such products have been held in such stores.

Mr. Jopling: At 31 October the position was:

Location	Commodity	Quantity tonnes
London
Hornsey	Beef	6
Hackney	Beef	920
	Butter	1,712
Stratford	Beef	157
Southall	Butter	1,122
Acton	Butter	696
Tottenham	Butter	672
West Midlands
Coventry	Bread Wheat	1,191
Kingswinford	Skimmed Milk Powder	2,040
Walsall	Beef	158
	Butter	2,711
Wolverhampton	Beef	457
	Butter	6,833

Because stocks are not constant, it is not possible to give meaningful figures for storage periods.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mrs. Norah McCabe

Mr. Parry asked the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland received from the coroner, under the Prosecution of Offences (N.I.) Order 1972, a report on the circumstances surrounding the death of Mrs. Norah McCabe on 9 July 1981.

The Solicitor-General: No. The police had already fully reported the facts to the Director who had taken his decision before the inquest was held.

Mr. Parry asked the Attorney-General if he was consulted by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland about any prosecutions arising out of the death of Mrs. Norah McCabe on 9 July 1981.

The Solicitor-General: No.

Mr. Parry asked the Attorney-General if he will now state why no prosecution has been commenced by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland in respect of the death of Mrs. Norah McCabe on 9 July 1981.

The Solicitor-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland carefully considered all the evidence available to him in this case, including the full version (as distinct from the edited version shown recently on television in this country) of the film that was taken by the Canadian news cameramen who were present and filming at the time of the incident in question. He concluded that the evidence did not warrant the institution of proceedings against any person in respect of Mrs. McCabe's death.

Mr. Parry asked the Attorney-General what are the criteria applied by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland in making a decision whether or not to bring a prosecution against a member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for offences of violence against members of the public; and if these criteria are different in any way from those which are applied in decisions concerning the prosecution of members of the public or of members of a police force in England and Wales.

The Solicitor-General: The criteria applied by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland in these cases are exactly the same as those applied in comparable cases involving members of the public or members of a police force in England and Wales.

DEFENCE

Airborne Early Warning

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the remaining Shackleton airborne early warning squadrons; and which system he expects to provide radar defence against low level attack in 12 months, 24 months and 36 months from now.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

WALES

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many multiple sclerosis sufferers there are in Wales; and how many specialist centres for the treatment of multiple sclerosis sufferers there are in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Since multiple sclerosis is not a notifiable disease detailed information on the numbers of sufferers is not held centrally. People with multiple sclerosis are a sub-group, albeit a large one, of a group of patients who suffer from disabling neurological conditions. Statistics obtained from district health authorities on the numbers of admissions to inpatient or attendances at outpatient departments are unlikely to reflect in full the incidence of the disease.

There are no specialist centres for multiple sclerosis sufferers in Wales. It is for district health authorities to provide and develop appropriate clinical facilities for those with multiple sclerosis, as indeed for other patients with disabling neurological conditions. Service provision is normally made available by district general hospitals.

School Books

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the financial cost in 1983-84 to the local education authorities of Wales of their purchasing of school books.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Reliable estimates of expenditure on school books are not available. Expenditure on school books and equipment by local authorities in Wales is provisionally estimated to have been £14·0 million in 1983-84.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the percentage of all school book costs in 1983-84 in the local education authorities of Wales provided by parental contribution.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is not available centrally.

Youth Service

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the amount of cash spent by the local education authorities of Wales on the youth service.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The latest available information refers to 1982-83 and is as follows:

	£ million
Youth Service Current	5·241
Youth Service Capital	0·172

Local Education Authorities (Expenditure Policies)

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to publish the report of Her Majesty's Inspectorate on the effects of local education authority expenditure policies in Wales in 1983-84.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Welsh Office has published the report today. Copies are available in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, in November; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; and in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being concluded.

Mr. Scott: During November 33 strip searches were carried out on 22 female inmates in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh. Individual prisoners were searched the following number of times:

Number of Prisoners	Number of Searches in each case

No prohibited articles were found during these searches and no prisoner refused to be searched.

Incident (Linden Street)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will now set up an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the death of Mrs. Norah McCabe on 9 July 1981;

(2) if any police disciplinary action has been taken against any officers who took part in the Royal Ulster Constabulary Land Rover patrol in the vicinity of Linden street, Belfast, on 9 July 1981;

(3) of the Royal Ulster Constabulary officers who took part in a Land Rover patrol in the vicinity of Linden street, Belfast, on 9 July 1981, how many (a) are still serving in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and (b) have been promoted in rank since that date;

(4) how many formal complaints have been made about incidents of police use of plastic baton rounds in each year since 1979; in how many cases the complaint has been upheld; and in how many cases disciplinary action has been taken against the officers involved;

(5) how many claims for damages have been made to date for alleged injury by plastic bullets fired by (a) the Army and (b) the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland; what have been the results so far; in how many cases liability has been admitted; in how many cases the courts has made the findings of liability; and what is the total sum of damages paid to date.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax (Telephone Bills)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to remove value added tax on telephone bills for elderly and disabled people.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. It remains Government policy to assist those in financial need through the system of grants and allowances which the recipients can spend in the way best suited to their individual needs rather than by indiscriminate reliefs from value added tax which give equal benefits to those who need financial help and those who do not.

Tax Changes

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make available a list of (a) tax changes already announced and due to take effect from April 1985 and (b) other provisions on which proposed legislation has been announced.

Mr. Moore: Yes, I am arranging for a list to be prepared. As soon as it is ready I will place a copy in the Library, and write to the hon. Member.

Money Supply

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the real money supply since the first quarter of 1974.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Chile

Dame Judith Hart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instruct the British executive director of the International Monetary Fund to oppose any proposal to approve a waiver of the performance criteria for Chile's current standby arrangement on 7 December.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Dame Judith Hart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has reviewed the bilateral or multilateral financial relationships between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Chile since the recent declaration of a state of siege in Chile.

Mr. Lawson: Her Majesty's Government keeps its relationships with Chile under constant review so that our relations with that country properly reflect both our concerns and our interests there.

Student Awards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what responses he has sent to the chairman of Leeds university council and the vice-chancellor of Kent university in reply to their recent complaints made to him concerning students' grant allocations and contributory parental income towards tuition fees.

Mr. Brooke: We have no record of having received letters from the chairman of the Leeds university council or the vice-chancellor of Kent university complaining about these matters.

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now seek to meet representatives of the major commercial banks in order to discuss the possibility of devising a special student loan facility as a supplement to grants.

Mr. Brooke: I would refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's statement on 5 December 1984 at columns 360-61. We have no doubt that the possibility of a special student loan facility will be one of the matters to be examined in the review which the Government will be undertaking.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost to the universities of his proposals for amending student grants in terms of (a) adverse cash flow and loss of interest on moneys in hand, (b) increased bad debts and (c) extra administration costs.

Mr. Brooke: The student grant proposals announced by my right hon. Friend on 5 December 1984 at columns 360-61 will not give rise to any such costs.

Institute of Hearing

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the progress of the work of the Institute of Hearing.

Mr. Brooke: At the Medical Research Council's Institute of Hearing Research the programme of research continues to progress well. A copy of the latest report published last year, which summarises the work being carried out at the institute's headquarters and its outstations, is available in the Library.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Food Surpluses)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Prime Minister, following her answer to the hon. Member for Dundee West, 22 November, Official Report, column 221, on denaturation of common market food surpluses in Britain, if she will (a) publish the names of the towns, cities or regions where such practices are carried out and (b) seek to end such activities and ensure that these surpluses are released instead to the Ethiopian famine effort.

The Prime Minister: (a) During the year ended 31 October 1984 denaturing has been carried out at the following locations:

Skimmed Milk Powder
- Renfrew
- Poole
- Wincham
- Thurnham
- Earls Croom
- Keynsham
- Kilmarnock
- Bovey Tracey
- Darlington
- Cupar
- Bucksburn
- Belfast
- Heanor
- Camborne
- Stamford
- Melmerby
- Leiston
- Betley
- Wellington
- Derby
- Northallerton
- Tymawn
- Hull
- Turriff
- Bridgewater
- Stowmarket

Wheat
- Mathwold
- Kings Lynn
- Skegness
- Wisbech

(b) No wheat is currently being denatured. The only skimmed milk powder being denatured is old stock which is not suitable for food aid. The Government and the Community are already taking more effective action to assist the drought-striken areas of Ethiopia than that proposed by the hon. Member.

ENVIRONMENT

Tenants' Charter

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to make recommendations to local housing authorities that they should monitor the effectiveness of the tenants' charter by maintaining lists.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend does not consider that this would be cost-effective.

could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Clear-up rates for recorded offences of violence against the person do not distinguish racial from non-racial attacks.

I shall write to the hon. Member with the breakdown of the figures for police divisions within N district.

Stop and Search

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of stop and searches done in each police district within N division of the Metropolitan police for each year between 1979 and 1983 and for each month in 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the available information is as given in the table. The table shows the number of persons or vehicles recorded as stopped; figures for stops of persons and stops of vehicles are not separately identifiable. Statistics showing the number of occasions on which a search was conducted are not available. Monthly figures are not collected centrally.

Stops of persons or vehicles in N District of the Metropolitan Police District

*Number

Police station/district	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Caledonian Road‡	1,600	400	—	—	—
N District Total	18,300	22,400	26,800	26,400	28,100

* The figures are rounded because they are based on information recorded in station registers for operational purposes and as this form of recording is unsuitable for the preparation of statistical summaries the resultant figures may be subject to some error. Components may not add to the total because they have been rounded independently.

† The rise in 1983 is largely due to a tightening up in recording procedures.

‡ Caledonian Road station closed 17 March 1980. Stops in this area were included thereafter in the station areas of Islington and Kings Cross Road.

Nuclear Attack

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he proposes to ensure that the British civilian population could be adequately protected from a nuclear attack; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is impossible to predict with any certainty the size of a nuclear attack, the targets it would include, or its effects. They would depend on the political and strategic intentions of an enemy at the time. The Government's policy of deterrence aims to prevent an attack of any sort happening.

But in the unlikely event of a nuclear attack, no part of the country could be judged safe from all its effects, and the Government's plans for the protection of the population therefore include a national system of warning and monitoring; the implementation by local authorities of their plans made under the 1983 regulations, including the utilisation of buildings and other structures for public shelter; and for improvement by the public of the shelter already afforded by their own homes. The existing guidance to both local authorities and the public is being revised for issue next year.

This Government do not seek to minimise the consequences of a massive nuclear attack: they would be horrific. But civil defence preparations, which the Government have strengthened considerably over the past five years, could save millions of lives and greatly reduce injury and suffering. Civil defence is a basic humanitarian duty of any Government and any local authority.

Courts (Fines)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government are considering the introduction of a day fine system in the courts.

Mr. Mellor: Not as a matter of high priority.

Prisoners (Parole)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the prisoners in the categories affected by the changes in administration of the parole system for the release of certain categories of prisoners on licence have been granted parole because of exceptional circumstances since the changes were made in October 1983; and what are the criteria used in deciding whether such exceptional circumstances exist.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) on 26 November at column 348.

Soliciting and Loitering

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of persons convicted of soliciting or loitering under the Street Offences Act 1959, and subsequently committed to prison for default of payment of the fines in respect of the following courts (a) Nottingham, (b) Old Street, (c) Sheffield, (d) Birmingham, (e) other courts recorded and (f) courts not recorded for the years 1982, 1983 and the first six months of 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information available, which is incomplete, is given in the following table:

Prostitutes committed into custody by magistrates' courts in default of payment of a fine

*Magistrates' court	1982	1983	1984†
Nottingham City	2	6	4
Nottingham County	—	—	—
Old Street	—	7	17
Sheffield	1	1	13
Birmingham	6	10	4
Other courts recorded	32	91	73
Courts not recorded	42	53	42
Total	83	168	153

* In the case of an offender not given time to pay who was also previously remanded in custody this is not necessarily the same as the court committing in default.

† January to June.

Prostitutes

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures the Government are taking to reduce the number of prostitutes imprisoned for fine default.

Mr. Mellor: We have encouraged magistrates' courts to do what they properly can to reduce the imprisonment of fine defaulters generally, by relating the amount of fines to offenders' means and by prompt follow-up action when default first occurs.

Metropolitan Police (Identification Parades)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has of the practice by the Metropolitan police of using London railway stations for the purpose of conducting identification parades; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The procedures for formal identification parades held in the Metropolitan police district and in other police forces are governed by the rules laid down in the Home Office circular 89/1978, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Formal identification parades take place in police stations or, exceptionally, in a prison.

The administrative guidance which accompanies the rules contemplates the situation where a witness may be allowed the opportunity of seeing a suspect in a group of people to test the witness's ability to identify the person whom he said he saw on a previous occasion. It is the practice of the Metropolitan police and other police forces to adopt this procedure when it is not practicable to arrange an identification parade, for example, because the suspect refuses or there are insufficient people of similar appearance willing to take part in a formal identification parade. Identification of this sort may take place in a railway station or other similar place where large numbers of members of the public can be expected to be present. The courts have accepted this procedure, which is clearly to be preferred to direct confrontation by a witness. The arrangements for this procedure are governed by the Commissioner's general orders which require that the rules governing identification parades should be followed so far as is practicable; they also stress the need to establish identification in the fairest possible way. The published draft code of practice for identification to be made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 covers this procedure.

Police (Free Facilities)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost to his Department of (a) free transport, (b) free prescriptions and (c) free dental treatment for police in the Metropolitan area for each of the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Metropolitan police officers are allowed free travel on London Regional Transport Underground trains and red buses for crime prevention purposes. This arrangement, introduced in 1975, involves no cost to the Metropolitan police fund or the Home Office. Under the Police Regulations 1979, police forces in England and Wales, including the Metropolitan Police, reimburse the cost to their officers of NHS prescriptions and (within NHS maximum rates) dental treatment. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that records of payments for the last three years in the Metropolitan police are not kept in a form which enables the amounts involved to be separately identified and such information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Records for earlier years have been destroyed.

Winson Green Prisoners (Dental Treatment)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made for dental treatment for prisoners on remand at Winson Green prison.

Mr. Mellor: All inmates at Birmingham prison including those on remand have access when necessary to the services of a dentist who attends twice weekly; should emergency treatment be required, inmates may be taken to the local dental hospital. The prison rules also provide that if an unconvicted prisoner desires the attendance of a dentist of his own choice and will pay any expense incurred, the governor shall, if he is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for the request and unless the Secretary of State otherwise directs, allow him to be visited and treated by that dentist in consultation with the prison medical officer. If the hon. Member has any particular case in mind I shall be happy to look into it.

Greenham Common (Policing Costs)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Thames valley about the cost of policing the off-base exercises by units of the 501st Tactical Missile Wing at Greenham common, since such exercises began; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 27 November 1984, c. 4.1]: The chief constable tells me that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

Mr. Watson asked the Minister of Agriculture, isheries and Food whether he is satisfied with the rrangements made within the European Economic ommunity for enforcement of the dairy quota scheme.

16. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of griculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that the uropean Commission will be able to enforce collection f superlevy on milk production in excess of quota in all ember states.

Mr. Jopling: I have repeatedly stressed in the Council f Agriculture Ministers that I regard it as a matter of the ighest importance that the milk supplementary levy ystem should be properly applied and enforced roughout the Community. The Commission has said it ready to take legal action against any member state hich does not apply the system or does not apply it roperly. I shall continue to insist that the arrangements ust be respected and that the Commission takes its sponsibilities.

22. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, sheries and Food whether he will make a statement on e operation of milk quotas to date.

34. Mr. Maude asked the Minister of Agriculture, sheries and Food if he will make a statement on the eration of the milk quota system.

Mr. Jopling: In order to ensure that claims for second ota and exceptional hardship applications can be dealt ith as quickly and as fairly as possible, I am trebling the embership of the diary produce quota tribunal. I am ntinuing to press in Brussels for greater flexibility tween direct sales and wholesale quota. Some 3,270 oducers have now been invited to participate in the tgoers scheme. Quota given up by outgoers will be llocated in due course to small producers and to ceptional hardship cases.

35. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of griculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied th the implementation by the Italian Government of the mmunity measures on dairy quotas.

Mr. Jopling: Italy has conducted a census of milk oducers in order to obtain the necessary information for plementing dairy quotas and has also announced an tgoers' scheme. Italy is not required by EC regulations make a levy collection till the end of the marketing year. hall continue to press for every member state to apply e levy according to the rules agreed and welcome the mmission's assurances that it will take legal steps ainst any member state failing to do so.

38. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further representations he has received about the implementation of milk quotas in the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have received many representations from milk producers and others who are anxious to ensure that the milk supplementary levy system is implemented fairly throughout the Community. I have repeatedly stressed, in the Agriculture Council and elsewhere, that I regard this matter as one of the greatest importance. The Commission has said that it intends to open infringement proceedings against any member state which does not apply the system or does not apply it properly. I shall continue to insist that the Commission fully takes its responsibilities in this.

Departmental Publications

13. Mr. Hannam asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will explain the reasons for the delay in issuing his Department's new publication Civil Defence and the Farmer (0 11 241233 5) which was shown on list No. 7, 1984, by Her Majesty's Stationery Office on 17 February.

Mrs. Fenner: The listing of this publication by Her Majesty's Stationery Office on 17 February was premature. No definite date can yet be given for its publication because the text is still subject to amendment on a number of points including the results of the Home Office review of the blast and radiation effects of a nuclear attack.

26. Mr. Malone asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will change the name of his new publication from "Home Defence and the Farmer" to "Civil Defence and the Farmer".

Mrs. Fenner: We will consider this suggestion.

44. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to complete his review of his publication, "Home Defence and the Farmer".

Mrs. Fenner: The review of this publication is now virtually complete but awaits further information on certain outstanding matters including the results of the Home Office review of the blast and radiation effects of a nuclear attack.

Veterinary Inspection Centres

14. Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusions he has reached on the current review of veterinary inspection centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The study report on the Ministry's veterinary investigation service is still under consideration in my Department and no conclusions have yet been reached. There will be full opportunity for consultations with outside interests.

Land Use

15. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if any annual estimate is made in his Department of the extent of the change of land use in the countryside from natural habitat to more productive agricultural use.

Mrs. Fenner: Most land in this country which has not been developed for non-agricultural use or afforested is already in productive agricultural use.

Sheep Producers (National Aids)

17. Mrs. Roe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had about the French Government's intention to introduce national aids for their sheep producers.

Mr. MacGregor: None. We are not aware that the French Government intend to introduce such aids.

Departmental Budget

18. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans any further changes in his Department's budget following the Chancellor's Autumn Statement.

Mr. Jopling: The changes in planned expenditure for 1985-86 were set out in the statement I gave on 12 November in reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Wealden (Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith), as supplemented by my statement of 29 November concerning the payment of hill livestock compensatory allowances. The expenditure plans for 1986-87 and 1987-88 will be published in the new year when I also plan to make a further statement about agricultural R & D.

Imported Eggs

19. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied that the regulations regarding imported egg consignments ensure that substandard eggs do not have access to the market.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. I can confirm that the regulations are as effective as is reasonably practicable.

Cereal Surpluses

20. Mr. Colvin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for dealing with cereal surpluses arising from over production in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: This is a Community matter which must be tackled by the Community as a whole. The Government will continue to argue for a clear and long term policy of cereals price restraint.

Farm Wardens

21. Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider delegating authority for the appointment and training of farm wardens to local authorities in consultation with the National Farmers Union.

Mrs. Fenner: No. Farm wardens would provide the link between farmers and the Ministry's wartime organisation and their selection and training is a matter for my Department.

40. Mr. Richard Page asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who will provide the training of his farm wardens when they are appointed.

Mrs. Fenner: Farm wardens will be trained by the appropriate local officers of my Department.

Potatoes (Surplus Crop)

23. Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken to help the Potato Marketing Board deal with the current season's surplus crop.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have authorised the implementation of market support arrangements based on a stockfeed programme and will be sharing the disposal costs with the Potato Marketing Board.

Rationing

24. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will release more information about rationing when the new consolidated circular is issued.

Mrs. Fenner: The information on food rationing in wartime to be included in the consolidated circular will be decided following consideration of comments on the draft circulated earlier this year which is at present the subject of discussion with those concerned.

Nuclear Attack (Protection)

25. Mr. Nell Thorne asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he can give to farmers wishing to learn how to protect their livestock and crops in the event of a nuclear attack.

Mrs. Fenner: Advice on this matter will be given when my Department publishes a revised version of the booklet "Home Defence and the Farmer".

Local Agricultural Control Organisation Manual

27. Mr. Ashby asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his updated local agricultural control organisation manual has been produced and distributed throughout his Department.

Mrs. Fenner: The manual has been issued within the Department in draft.

Cereal Exports

28. Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the provision of British credit guarantees for cereal exports.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade announced on 3 December a number of improvements in the provision by Export Credits Guarantee Department of credit guarantees for the export of grain and malt. I welcome these changes, which should contribute to the United Kingdom's increasingly successful export performance.

"Food and Agricultural Controls in War"

29. Mr. Terlezki asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he hopes to issue the revised circular ES1/1979 "Food and Agricultural Controls in War".

Mrs. Fenner: A final version will be issued as part of the Home Office consolidated circular on civil defence on completion of the consultations with local authorities about the draft of that circular issued for comment in July this year.

Chemical Weapons (Crops and Livestock)

30. Mr. Speed asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will include in his revised edition of "Home Defence and the Farmer" information on the effect of chemical weapons on crops and livestock.

Mrs. Fenner: No. The Government are a party to the 1972 convention banning biological weapons. We are playing a leading part at the conference on disarmament at Geneva to achieve a comprehensive verifiable ban on the production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons. We will keep the House informed of progress.

Racing Pigeons (Vaccination)

31. Mr. Boyes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many racing pigeons have been vaccinated against paramyxovirus II; and what information he has as to the average cost per bird.

Mrs. Fenner: Vaccine sales suggest that well over 2·5 million racing pigeons have been vaccinated against paramyxovirus 1 which is the strain of the virus which has affected pigeons. The cost of vaccination is about 36p to 40p per bird.

EC (Surplus Butter)

Mr. Cockeram asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government will seek authority from the European Economic Community for further sales of cheap surplus butter in 1985.

Mr. Jopling: Stocks of surplus butter have built up because the Community has set support prices at levels which encourage production and discourage consumption. The freeze in the target price for milk and the introduction of quotas agreed at the 1984 CAP price fixing were important steps towards securing a better balance in the market and so avoiding the need for special disposal measures. Special short term sales of butter on the Community market tend to disrupt normal supplies, force fresh butter into intervention stocks and are costly to the Community budget. We opposed the present scheme and would not favour its repetition later in 1985.

Less-favoured Areas

33. Mr. Bruce asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the present state of hill farming in less-favoured areas.

Mrs. Fenner: We are satisfied that the present level of support to farmers in the less-favoured areas is proving highly effective in maintaining the long-term viability of hill farms whilst at the same time stemming the decline in rural population. Our policy in this regard will be greatly assisted by the extension to the United Kingdom's less-favoured areas which we achieved earlier this year. This has paved the way for the Government to provide to upland farms for the first time both higher rates of capital grants and headage payments on cattle and sheep. The proposed new structures measures, currently being discussed in the Community will, if agreed in their present form, make possible the continuation of Community support for hill farming largely unchanged.

North Sea Herring

36. Mr. Wallace asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in agreeing shares of North sea herring between Norway and the European Community.

Mr. MacGregor: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave this afternoon to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie).

Soil Survey

37. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his plans for future funding of the Soil Survey of England and Wales.

Mrs. Fenner: I am unable to add anything to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) on 26 November 1984 at column 406.

"Advice to the Farmer"

39. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the proposals in "Advice to the Farmer" produced by North Yorkshire county council, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mrs. Fenner: These background reference notes contain soundly based advice to farmers, much of it taken from an American publication, on how to protect their farms against radioactive fallout.

Departmental Emergency Plans

41. Mr. Lawler asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider the downgrading of the security classification of his Department's emergency plans.

Mrs. Fenner: No. My Department's emergency plans already bear the lowest security classification appropriate to their contents.

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service (Report)

42. Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet the president of the National Farmers Union to discuss the recommendations in Professor Bell's report on the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service.

Mr. Jopling: I have no plans at present to discuss formally the recommendations contained in Professor Bell's report with the president of the National Farmers Union. However, I regularly meet the president of the National Farmers Union to discuss general agricultural matters and that gives us the opportunity to discuss the report. I have invited all interested parties to let us have their views on the contents of the report by 4 January 1985.

Farm Animal Welfare Council (Codes of Practice)

43. Sir Michael Shaw asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made by the Farm Animal Welfare Council on the revision of the codes of practice.

Mrs. Fenner: The council has completed its revisions of the welfare codes. Revised codes for cattle and pigs were published in 1983. As regards the poultry codes, I refer to the reply given on 22 November at c. 247 to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd).

Agricultural Training Board

45. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provision Her Majesty's Government are making to help the work of the Agricultural Training Board.

Mr. Jopling: The Agricultural Training Board receives considerable financial and practical assistance from my Department. Provision has been made for a grant-in-aid to the board of £7·65 million in the current financial year and the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service gives assistance on training matters at both national and local level. The Manpower Services Commission also makes a contribution towards specific projects undertaken by the board and training groups.

Horses and Ponies (Welfare)

Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the measures he takes to secure the welfare of horses and ponies.

Mrs. Fenner: The Protection of Animals Acts 1911 to 1964 provide the main welfare protection for horses and ponies for which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is responsible. When they are on agricultural land, equines are protected by part I of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968 which is the responsibility of the Agriculture Ministers. As for the welfare of equines in transit, protection is provided by the Transit of Animals (Road and Rail) Order 1975 which is enforced by the local authorities. In 1979, Agriculture Ministers issued a code of practice for the guidance of operators of horse, pony and donkey markets, sales and fairs.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers held in Brussels on 3 and 4 December.

Mr. Jopling: Together with my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State in my Department, I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers on 4 December.

The Council agreed guide prices for fishery products for 1985 on the basis of a compromise proposal by the Presidency, which was generally satisfactory from the United Kingdom point of view.

It was agreed that the prohibition on fishing for mackerel to the west of Scotland north of 58°N from 1 to 31 December 1984 should be lifted, an accordance with the latest scientific advice. This decision was a very important one for our pelagic fleet as most of the mackerel catches off the west coast are still being taken north of 58°. This means that this fishery will be able to continue, within the United Kingdom quota of 234,700 tonnes, for the rest of the year. There was also general agreement to postpone the deadline for a decision on an increase in the minimum mesh size in the English Channel until 1 July 1987 but we reserved our position pending completion of Parliamentary scrutiny procedures.

The council approved the arrangements for 1985 negotiated with Sweden under the EC/Sweden framework agreement. There were also informal discussions on the continuing negotiations between the Community and Norway on the arrangements for 1985 under the EC/Norway agreement. I urged the Commission to stand firm on the question of Norway's allocation of North sea herring next year and this was agreed. In a discussion of the continuing negotiations between the Community and the Faroe islands, we emphasised the importance we attached to a reduction in the Faroes intercepting fishery on Atlantic salmon.

The council discussed the problem raised by overfishing by some member states of the Community's allocation of saithe in the North sea. An increase in the Community availability was adopted on a basis agreed with Norway which will allow three member states to continue or to resume fishing. The United Kingdom received an additional quota of about 400 tonnes. I asked the Commission to report to the Council in due course on the results of the year's activities of its Inspectorate of Inspectorates in supervising the enforcement of Community rules by the member states. It undertook to do so. I also asked the Commission to prepare a report to the Council on the general question of overfishing of quotas and any appropriate arrangements for compensation by the member states responsible. This was generally welcomed and could be very important in encouraging greater discipline in future.

There was a discussion of the supply and demand situation within the Community for herring on the basis of a report by the Commission and it was agreed in principle to open a small additional tariff-free quota for the period 1 January to 15 February 1985 for the purposes of manufacturers of specialised products.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what experiments will be carried out on animals to test the safety and efficacy of new and existing products as proposed in the Government's Food and Environment Protection Bill; what species of animals will be used; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: No final decision has been taken on the type of tests that may be required but they are likely to be broadly similar to the guidelines laid down in the pesticides safety precautions scheme.

Grants and Subsidies (Expenditure)

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give details of expenditure in 1983-84 and 1984-85 by the agricultural departments on agricultural grants and subsidies, excluding market regulation, under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: Details are given of the outturn for 1983-84 and the latest forecast of outturn for 1984-85:

	Outturn 1983-84 £ million	Latest forecast of outturn 1984-85 £ million

Juvenile Fines and Compensation Orders (Payment by Parents)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many parents were ordered to pay fines imposed on juveniles in 1982, 1983, and so far in 1984; and how many in each year were imprisoned for default;

(2) how many parents were ordered to pay compensation orders imposed on juveniles in 1982, 1983 and so far in 1984; and if any were imprisoned for default.

Mr. Mellor: The recording of these cases may be incomplete in the information available to me which is given in the following table. To include summary motoring offences would involve a disproportionate cost. Preliminary indications are that such orders were being made much more frequently in the early months of 1984.

Parent or guardian ordered to pay a fine or compensation order for indictable and summary (excluding motoring) offences at all courts in England and Wales and persons received into prison for default of payment*

Unemployment and Violent Crime

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he is aware of into the relationship between the level of unemployment and the incidence of violent crime; and if he will publish any statistical analysis he has received concerning such a relationship in the Official Report.

Mr. Mellor: I am not aware of any research—in this country at least—into the relationship between the level of unemployment and the incidence of violent crime. Various studies examining the relationship between the level of unemployment and recorded crime in all categories were reviewed in an article in Home Office research bulletin No. 14, published in 1982, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. In short, the article reported that more studies found no evidence of a significant relationship between the level of unemployment and crime than found some evidence of such a relationship.

Civil Defence College

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to expand the numbers of tutorial staff at the Civil Defence College, Easingwold, in 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Not at present.

Young Persons (Prosecutions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will defer implementing his proposals for an independent prosecutor in respect of young persons aged under 17 years until Her Majesty's Government's review of the proposals of the Social Services Committee in its report "The Care of Children" is available.

Mr. Mellor: No. This reform will not affect the operation of the existing arrangements for consultation between the police and other agencies before any decision to prosecute a juvenile is taken; it will indeed provide an opportunity for such decisions to be independently reviewed. Nor will it prejudice the Government's further consideration of the issues which the Select Committee raised concerning procedures for dealing with juveniles alleged to have committed offences. (The Government's response to the Committee's specific recommendations was given in Cmnd. 9298, published in July).

Shops (Opening Hours)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, following the recommendation of the Auld committee of inquiry that all legal restrictions on the opening hours of shops should be abolished, what representations he has had from local authorities as to the enforcement of existing legislation prior to him introducing appropriate amending legislation.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Television Licences

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he has any plans to extend the system of concessionary television licences to cover other forms of residential establishment;

(2) if he will list those categories of premises the residents of which are entitled to concessionary television licences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The kinds of accommodation whose residents may qualify for the concessionary accommodation for residential care television licence are laid down in the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) Regulations 1984. They are essentially:

(i) old persons' homes;
(ii) disabled persons' homes;
(iii) residential homes for mentally disordered persons;
(iv) sheltered housing schemes provided specially for retirement pensioners; physically disabled persons or mentally disordered persons by local authorities under prescribed housing legislation, or by development corporations or housing associations.

There are at present no plans to extend the range of establishments which qualify for the accommodation for residential care licence.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total value of concessionary television licences issued in each of the last three years for which figures are available;

(2) how many concessionary television licences were issued in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of concessionary accommodation for residential care licences in force at the end of the last three financial years, and the total estimated value of the concession in each of those years, are as follows:

Year ended 31 March	Number of licences	Value £ million
1982	16,391	10
1983	17,537	13
1984	18,581	14·5

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are taken into account when deciding to grant concessionary television licences to the residents of particular establishments.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 29 November at column 542.

Coal Industries Dispute

Mr. Robert Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost of policing the miners' strike in the Merseyside area at the latest date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that up to 27 October the additional costs to the Merseyside police authority resulting from the policing of the miners' dispute in the county were some £3·9 million.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many miners have received injuries on picket lines during the miners' dispute to the latest date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is not possible to provide an accurate figure for the number of miners injured, because not all cases would be reported to the police.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest estimate of the cost of policing the miners' strike at the latest date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information on the total costs of the dispute to date is not available. The Home Office has so far paid to police authorities in England and Wales advances of police grant, and of the special payment which my right hon. and learned Friend is making available, on expenditure totalling £95·8 million.

Women (Attacks)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the number of reported attacks on women and the police clear-up rate for each Metropolitan police district for each year since 1979 and for each police area within N division in each month of 1984 to date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Racial Harassment

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the Metropolitan police procedures on dealing with racial harassment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The present Metropolitan police procedures for dealing with racial incidents, including racial harassment, were introduced at the end of April 1983 and the details were made public at that time. I am sending the hon. Member a copy of the relevant Metropolitan police press release.

In addition to these procedures a new programme of policing skills training has been established at district training centres, part of which is designed to help officers respond more sympathetically and positively to racial incidents. This training will be given to all officers up to the rank of superintendent. These arrangements apply throughout the Metropolitan police district.

In five districts (Tower Hamlets, Newham, Bexley and Greenwich, Harringay and Ealing and Hillingdon) where racial attacks have been particularly worrying, a review of current procedures, using a new method of crime analysis, has been set in hand. The object is to find the root cause of the problem and to involve all relevant agencies in the area in tackling it. The lessons of these reviews will be applied, as appropriate, throughout London.

As I have previously informed the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) in reply to a question, my right hon. and learned Friend and I will keep the House informed of progress.

Racial Attacks

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the reported incidents of racial attack and police clear-up rate for each Metropolitan police district for each year since 1979 and for each police area within N division.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The figures for racial incidents in the Metropolitan police area by district from 1 May 1982 to 31 October 1984 are given in the table:

Racial incidents in the Metropolitan Police area by district for the period 1 May 1982 to 31 October 1984

The Metropolitan police have not kept separate figures for racial attacks since May 1982 when they introduced new procedures for dealing with racially motivated incidents and broadened the definition of incidents to be recorded to include those which do not necessarily involve the commission of a criminal offence. Figures for racial attacks before May 1982 are not readily available and

New Towns

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what specific new developments are going to be financed in the 21 new towns of England and Wales resulting from the assets acquired from the sale by development corporations of commercial and industrial property.

Sir George Young: The accounts of the development corporations and the Commission for the New Towns (HC/ 83/84/ 610 and 611) show that in 1983-84 in the 21 new towns in England there were capital receipts of £151,198,000, which supported capital investment of £192,464,000. About £77 million of these capital receipts came from the disposal of industrial and commercial assets. An analysis of the capital expenditure by each corporation is contained in the first schedule to each set of accounts. The accompanying annual reports highlight the more significant individual projects. In the current and future financial years, capital receipts will continue to support generally the housing, sewerage, roads, commercial, industrial and amenity investment of the new towns. The two new towns in Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

STOLport

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to give his final decision on the planning application and inspector's report regarding the development of a STOLport in docklands.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend is consulting the parties about new evidence received since the public inquiry. He will give his decision as soon as possible after that consultation is completed.

Stansted and Heathrow

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the inspector's report on the Stansted and Heathrow terminal 5 inquiries.

Mr. Gow: The inspector's report will be published on Monday 10 December when copies will be placed in the Library and in the Vote Office and in those public libraries where the transcripts were deposited. It will be posted to the applicants, to the local planning authorities in whose areas the sites of the proposed developments lie, to section 29 parties and to the organisations and individuals represented at the inquiries.

The inspector's report is very long. A shortened version, comprising extracts from the report, will be published separately. That version will include all the inspector's conclusions and recommendations. Those receiving the full report will receive the shortened version.

Further copies of the full report and of the shortened version will be available as soon as possible.

Buses

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations he has received from transport users supporting his bus service deregulation proposals.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have been asked to reply.

I have received numerous responses from transport users for and against various aspects of the White Paper on buses.

SCOTLAND

North of Scotland Hydroelectric Board (Fishing Beats)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will estimate the profits which will accrue in the first year following sale to the North of Scotland Hydroelectric Board, following its sale of several fishing beats on the river Conon, Ross-shire.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is a commercial matter for the board. The sale price has not been disclosed at this stage.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the conditions pertaining to the recent sale of fishing beats on the river Conon, Ross-shire, by the North of Scotland Hydroelectric Board in so far as they affect future access to the beats by local fishermen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I understand that the new owner of the three Brahan beats plans to offer the fishings for let on a weekly basis to previous tenants and local interests, and certain weeks in July, August and September will be resold. The new owners of the Coul beat have indicated that they will give priority to previous tenants and to local interests for any fishing that may be available for letting. The board has made it clear that it hopes to come to satisfactory arrangements with local angling clubs, hotels and others, before the remaining beats are disposed of in order to maintain access by local anglers and visitors. I am satisfied that a reasonable balance has been struck between the case for continuing local access and the need to dispose of an asset irrelevant to the board's main business.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much he expects to be paid into the Consolidated Fund as a result of the sale of several fishing beats on the river Conon, Ross-shire, by the North of Scotland Hydroelectric Board.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There will be no payment into the Consolidated Fund. The proceeds of the sale will be used in the general financing of the board's business, thereby keeping borrowings below what would otherwise have been required.

HOME DEPARTMENT

BBC (Licence Fee)

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what further information he has sought to date from the British Broadcasting Corporation in support of its application for an increased licence fee; what further information he plans to seek; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information was supplied by the British Broadcasting Corporation to support its request for an increase in the licence fee;

(3) what was the level of licence fee requested by the British Broadcasting Corporation mentioned in his answer of Tuesday 20 November, Official Report, column 105, and the period the increase is designed to cover.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The BBC has submitted an application for an increase in the licence fee but in accordance with past practice my right hon. and learned Friend does not propose to disclose the details of the request submitted or the precise way in which he will examine it. He will, however, take account of the findings of the independent consultants appointed by the BBC, at his suggestion, to examine the scope for the BBC to provide its existing services at their present standard but at lower cost through increased efficiency in the use of resources. In reaching a view on the application he will seek to balance the needs of the BBC with the interests of the licence fee payer.

Penal Establishments (Improvements)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will list all penal establishments at which improvements or refurbishments are being carried out, or are planned, indicating for each (a) the date planning started, (b) when the scheme started or is planned to start, (c) the work to be done and (d) whether the scheme includes integral sanitation.

Mr. Mellor: The information readily available in relation to major capital schemes in the current five-year programme to improve or replace living accommodation at existing penal establishments is set out in the following table. Schemes to improve or replace ancillary facilities are in progress or planned at a further 54 establishments.

Name of Establishment	Scheme	Year of Start	Whether integral sanitation included

Certificates of Unruly Character

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is proposed to make any changes in respect of the present powers of the courts relating to the issue of unruly certificates.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend proposes to make an order defining more restrictively than does the Certificates of Unruly Character (Conditions) Order 1977 the circumstances in which a 15 or 16-year-old boy may be remanded to a prison department establishment. In particular, he proposes that the power should be confined to cases where the boy has been charged with murder, attempted murder, rape, or certain other equally serious offences. He is also considering whether there are other ways in which the range of cases where remand to a prison department establishment is possible might be reduced to the minimum.

Racism Awareness

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he, other Ministers in his Department or any other members of his Department have attended racism awareness training courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Ministers and the officials concerned seek continuously to advance their awareness of race relations matters. To this end they carry out a regular programme of visits to ethnic minority communities and maintain direct contact with many ethnic minority organisations throughout the country. In addition many members of my Department have attended race relations courses and seminars and the subject is also covered in a range of more general training courses provided both internally and externally.

Representation of the People Bill 1984

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it remains his intention that the proposals in clause 1 of the Representation of the People Bill 1984 should come into operation immediately upon Royal Assent.

Mr. Mellor: No. Clause 27(2) brings the provisions of the Bill into force on such day or days as my right hon. and learned Friend appoints by order made by statutory instrument.

Bolton (Exercises)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil defence exercises and Royal Observer Corps exercises have been carried out in each of the last five years in the Bolton metropolitan district council area; and which authorities have been notified in each case.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am not aware of any. All county authorities have notification of exercises involving the Royal Observer Corps.

Conventional Warfare (Policy)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the removal of population in the vicinity of nuclear power stations in the event of a war fought with conventional weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Local authorities are responsible for plans to protect the population in their area and are guided in this by the Goverment. The planning assumptions for civil defence are set out in Home Office Circular number ES 1/1984 (a copy of which is in the Library of the House). It is expected that the use of conventional weapons would be confined to targets of military significance and it is unlikely that an enemy would give high priority to industrial or civilian targets (that is, including nuclear power stations). I also refer the hon. Member to the replies given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy on 12 and 26 November at c. 92-3 and 370-71.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police forces in England and Wales which currently hold stocks of plastic baton rounds; how many such baton rounds are held by each force; what form of training for their use is supplied; how many officers have been so trained; if he will place in the Library a copy of the current instructions relating to their use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following police forces are understood to hold stocks of plastic baton rounds:

Metropolitan Police
Avon and Somerset
Essex
Humberside
Lancashire
Leicestershire

Lincolnshire
Merseyside
North Wales
North Yorkshire
Sussex
Warwickshire
Wiltshire

It would not be conducive to operational effectiveness to give details of the number of baton rounds held by individual forces or the full text of guidelines on their operational use that have been issued to chief officers of police.

However, the guidelines stipulate that baton rounds, which must be of a type authorised by the Home Office, are to be used only with the express authority of the chief officer of police (or, in his absence, his deputy), under the direction and control of a senior officer whom he has designated as officer in charge and by police officers who have been trained in the use of the equipment and know its characteristics.

They are to be used only as a last resort in cases where conventional methods of policing have been tried and failed or must, from the nature of the cirucumstances obtaining, be unlikely to succeed if tried, and where the chief officer judges such action to be necessary because of the risk of loss of life or serious injury or widespread destruction of property. Whenever practicable, a public warning of their use is to be given.

Nothing in the guidelines affects the principle set out in section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 that only the minimum force necessary in the circumstances must be used. The degree of force justified will vary according to the circumstances in each case.

I shall write to the hon. Member about police training in the use of baton rounds.

Metropolitan Police (Clear-up Rates)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the clear-up rate for murder in the Metropolitan police area in each of the last five years; and what it has been in the three police authority areas with the best clear-up rate for murder and the three areas with the worst, excluding the Metropolitan and City of London police.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984, c. 4]: In cases of homocide it is not possible, in the absence of a court decision, to distinguish between offences of murder, manslaughter and infanticide. In the years 1979 to 1983 the clear-up rates for offences of homocide recorded in the Metropolitan Police District were 93 per cent., 95 per cent., 87 per cent., 77 per cent. and 89 per cent. respectively. Annual figures for other police force areas are subject to wider variation, especially for smaller police force areas, owing to the small numbers involved, variations in the type of case being dealt with, and because offences cleared up in one year may have been recorded in a previous year. Hence, the variation between police force areas is illustrated by the following table which gives for all offences of homocide recorded by the police aggregate figures for 1979 to 1983 for all police force areas.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Scientific Conferences (USA)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United States Government about their refusal to allow certain British scientists assisting this Government in high technology to attend some scientific conferences in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have expressed to the United States Government our concern over undue restrictions on the access by British scientists and technologists to conferences and seminars in the United States. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office continues to keep closely in touch with developments in the United States and with leading scientific organisations in the United Kingdom.

TRANSPORT

Bitumen (Costs)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect he expects the recent rise in the price of bitumen to have on the road construction and maintenance programme in 1985-86.

Mrs. Chalker: It is too early to assess the net effect of the recent increase in the price of bitumen on output in road construction and maintenance in 1985-86, because the price of bitumen is only one of many factors which determine overall costs.

Railways (Safety)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ask the Railway Inspectorate to report on the effectiveness of the safety devices on the three light signal system.

Mr. David Mitchell: There are a number of safety devices associated with colour-light signals. They include such things as the replacement of the previous signal to Danger if a lamp bulb should fail, and the automatic warning system. The effectiveness of these safety devices is commented on, where appropriate, in the Railway Inspectorate's published accident reports. Their relevance to recent accidents will be covered in the inquiry reports, so there would be no particular gain from a separate study or report.

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of rail accidents involving passenger trains during 1982, 1983 and 1984 showing how many deaths resulted; what were the causes of these accidents; and whether he is satisfied with the measures being taken to reduce rail accidents.

Mr. David Mitchell: The numbers of significant passenger train accidents on all railways in Great Britain during 1982, 1983 and 1984 are shown in the table. Significant accidents, as defined in the Department's published Annual Report on Railway Safety, are those which are actually or potentially hazardous to passengers. They include all derailments and most collisions but exclude minor incidents: details of the latter are given in the annual reports. Separate causes of all the accidents in the table cannot be readily shown, but in general about half are caused by errors and omissions on the part of railway staff, a third by mechanical defects, and the remainder by a variety or combination of causes.

Significant Passenger Train Accidents

Year	Number of Accidents	Fatalities		Passenger Journeys (Millions)
		Passenger	Staff
1982	66	Nil	2	1,126
1983	78	2	Nil	1,260
1984*	62	17	2	1,220

* In the case of the number of accidents the 1984 figures are provisional, based on accident returns made up to 5 December 1984. Thirteen of the passenger fatalities occurred in one accident (Polmont). In the case of passenger journeys, the 1984 figure is estimated for the whole year.

Measures to reduce accidents are the responsibility of the railway authorities. The Railway Inspectorate monitors all aspects of railway safety and reports regularly on the safety situation — in its annual report and in the published reports on individual accidents. These reports show that, overall, the railways have been becoming progressively safer during the past decade.

Public Transport

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the number of passenger miles travelled in (a) Essex and (b) Thurrock borough council area by public transport in 1977, 1979, 1981, 1983 and 1984; and what information he has as to the deficit or surplus per passenger mile on these services.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is not available for individual boroughs. The stage carriage returns for bus operations submitted by Essex county council contain no information about passenger miles but the following figures have been extracted from the returns.

	1977-78	1979-80	1981-82	1983-84	1984-85
Passengers carried (000)	85,777	79,976	76,997	70,150	66,629*
Revenue support payments (other than concessionary fares) (£000)	1,209	1,680	2,235	3,121	3,735*
Revenue support per passenger carried (pence)	1·4	2·1	2·9	4·4	5·6*

* estimate.

Buses

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the response of Eastern National and London Country bus companies to the White Paper, "Buses" (Cmnd. 9301.)

Mr. David Mitchell: I am not aware of any response from Eastern National and London Country but it is in any case for the authors of responses to the White Paper to make them public if they wish.

Dartford Tunnel

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the repayment of debt on the Dartford tunnel and the consequent abolition of the tolls.

Mrs. Chalker: The tunnel is the responsibility of the Kent and Essex county councils. I understand that the councils estimate that tunnel debts will be repaid during the financial year 1993-4. However, the Dartford Tunnel Act 1984, which repeats earlier legislation, also requires maintenance and reserve funds to be established before tolls can cease. The councils' most recent estimate is that those funds will be established during the financial year 1996-97. The estimates are obviously sensitive to the actual level of traffic growth over the next 10 years.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport when formal plans for a third Dartford tunnel will be drawn up.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) on 3 December at column 34.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the design capacity of the Dartford tunnel in terms of vehicle usage per hour.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall answer this question shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Young Workers Scheme

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has available as to the size of firms which are providing jobs under the young workers scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information from a sample survey carried out in early 1983 suggests the distribution of approved applications under the young workers scheme, but by size of establishment and not by size of firm. The information is as follows:

Size of establishment (employees)	Percentage
1 to 10	57
11 to 24	23
25 to 49	9
50 to 99	4
100 to 199	4
200 to 499	2
500 plus	1

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has on the breakdown of jobs provided under the young workers scheme by standard industrial classification.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since the young workers scheme started in January 1982, approved applications have been categorised by standard industrial classification divisions. The breakdown for October, the latest date for which information is available, is:

Young workers scheme approved applications—monthly breakdown by standard industrial classification

SIC division number and division	October per cent.
0 Agriculture, forestry and fishing	3
1 Energy and water supply industries	1
2 Extraction of minerals and ores other than fuels; manufacture of metals, mineral products and chemicals	2
3 Metal goods, engineering and vehicles industries	9
4 Other manufacturing industries	14
5 Construction	15
6 Distribution, hotels and catering; repairs	29
7 Transport and communication	3
8 Banking, finance, insurance, business services and leasing	8
9 Other services	16

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been taken on to the young workers scheme after they have been on either (a) the youth opportunities programme or (b) the youth training scheme with the same employer.

Mr. Alan Clark: The only information currently available is a sample survey conducted between February and April 1983 which suggested that 32 per cent. of young workers had been on a youth opportunities programme, 26 per cent. with the same employer.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people on mode B youth training schemes are currently employed in psychiatric hospitals; in what capacity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All young people on mode B of the youth training scheme are unemployed trainees. They may spend part of their training period in work placements in a wide variety of establishments, which may include psychiatric hospitals. However, no central records are maintained of the number of placements of this kind which are in use.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) male and (b) female young people have completed the youth training schemes in the Hull travel-to-work area, by year, since the inception of the scheme; and if he will indicate those who obtained permanent employment with the employer with whom they trained and of the rest of the number who obtained permanent employment within (i) six months, (ii) 12 months and (iii) are still unemployed following the completion of their training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information is not available in the form requested. The number of young people who completed their expected time on the youth training scheme in the county of Humberside between 1 April 1984 and 31 October 1984 was 2,585, of whom 1,532 were males and 1,053 were females. Information on the subsequent destination of these young people is not available.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to extend the Manpower Services Commission community programme to two years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many building trade operatives are registered as unemployed in the Hackney, North and Stoke Newington parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about occupations is not available in the unemployment benefit office records on which the unemployment count is now based.

Unemployment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the rise in the level of unemployment in the west midlands region currently compares with that of London and the south-east; and how it has compared with the same area in each year since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of unemployed claimants by region are available in the House of Commons Library. Comparisons are affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which enable some men, mainly aged 60 and over, to receive the long term rate of supplementary benefit and national insurance credits without having to sign on at an unemployment benefit office.

Liverpool Skillcentre

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what will be the implications for employment of his plan to close the Liverpool skillcentre; how many instructors will be made redundant; what will be the savings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 6 December 1984, c. 258]: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 29 November at columns 1108-16. Proposals for the future of the skillcentre network have been put to the Manpower Services Commission by the skillcentre training agency and the Commission has yet to consider them.

Around 450 of the staff who would be affected nationally are in the instructional grades including some 37 at Liverpool skillcentre. The Manpower Services Commission would discuss detailed proposals with the relevant trade unions with a view to achieving the proposed changes with as little disruption to staff as possible.

The closure of Liverpool skillcentre would result in an annual saving to the agency in premises costs alone of about £400,000. The proposals as a whole would ensure the agency achieved full cost-recovery from 1986-87, thus ending the need for a subvention from the taxpayer.

Under locally run adult training programmes as a whole we plan to more than double the number of people who will be trained in Liverpool and Sefton from around 2,000 in 1984-85 to around 4,400 in 1985-86.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Credit Cards (Fraud)

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will seek information from the Office of Fair Trading on its inquiries into the practices of credit card companies in seeking to prevent fraud; what representations he has received from credit card companies about the handling of these inquiries by the Office of Fair Trading; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976, the Office of Fair Trading has a statutory duty to register restrictive agreements coming within the scope of the Act and to refer these to the restrictive practices court. I understand that earlier this year the credit card companies approached the office for preliminary discussions on the possible application of the Act to a proposed joint arrangement concerning credit card fraud. The office was unable to give a view without further details, which the companies agreed to provide if they wished to proceed. The companies have so far not followed this up with the office. I have received no representations from the credit card companies on this subject.

Ring Main Plugs

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is considering legislation to require that all ring main plugs sold are so designed as to permit the use of only one fuse rating; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: No. Such a regulation would involve redesign of both plugs and fuses, but would not in itself ensure that particular groups of appliances were fitted with fused plugs of particular ratings. In any case, the additional protection for the consumer would be negligible.

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is considering legislation to prohibit the use of electrical appliances with fused plugs without the plug being fitted with the capacity of fuse which maximises the protection of the appliance.

Mr. Fletcher: No. There are clear and serious objections to safety legislation covering the use of consumer products in people's homes rather than the commercial supply of such goods. Moreover, such a requirement, even if it were enforceable, would provide negligible additional protection to consumers.

Regional Policy

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the £400 million which he plans to continue to spend each year on regional policy to improve job prospects in areas of high unemployment he expects will be allocated to the west midlands; and which sectors he envisages will be primarily eligible for grants allocation.

Mr. Trippier: The distribution of expenditure on regional industrial policy will continue to be determined by demand within the assisted areas. Parts of the west midlands are now intermediate areas, so firms in those parts now qualify for regional selective assistance for which all sectors of industry are now eligible on the same basis. Only firms in development areas are eligible for regional development grants which are expected to account for about half the total expenditure of about £400 million in 1987-88.

Job Creation

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what level of funding has been allocated for the purpose of supporting capital intensive projects during 1984; and how many new jobs have been created as a result.

Mr. Trippier: The concept of capital-intensity is not specifically employed in the allocation of funds. However, in the Government's view the old scheme of regional development grants had, in practice, too great a bias in favour of capital. The changes announced on 28 November by my hon. Friend, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, are intended to reduce this bias.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry upon what assumptions he has based his statement that introducing the new regional aid policy will cost nearly £300 million per year less than continuing the present one.

Mr. Trippier: On the basis of the previous policy and expected investment intentions it is estimated that nearly £700 million would have been spent on regional industrial policy in 1987-88. The expected savings of nearly £300 million in that year are mainly attributable to the introduction of the new RDG scheme. That will enable savings to be made by the exclusion of replacement investment from grant, by the application of the grant per job ceiling in relation to large undertakings and as a result of the abolition of special development areas and their higher rate of capital grant. These savings will be partly offset by the job grant alternative to capital grant, the extension of the regional development grant scheme to some service activities, the increase in the total coverage of the assisted area map, and the increase in regional selective assistance for modernisation projects.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what level of costs will be incurred arising from the proposed replacement of the former system of regional aid by the new system.

Mr. Trippier: The changes in regional industrial incentives will involve extra costs as the transitional provisions meant that, in effect, the new and old RDG schemes and the new and old assisted area maps will overlap. We expect expenditure on the old RDG scheme to be nearly £700 million over the next three financial years.

Polyurethane (Joint Ventures)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning ventures which have been jointly undertaken by chemical groups in the United Kingdom with enterprises in member countries of COMECON for the purpose of producing polyurethane for domestic and export markets.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd. (Pension Fund)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements for the Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd. pension fund will be made following privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

General Practitioners (Prescriptions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to prevent general practitioners making available blank signed prescription forms to be filled in by non-medical staff.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The practice is contrary to the terms of service for doctors, and any evidence of it should be referred to the medical services committee concerned for consideration of whether a breach of those terms of service has occurred. A finding of breach of this kind would be a serious matter and should represent a significant deterrent to any practitioner contemplating such action.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on the provision of kidney machines in the National Health Service in 1983-84; and how that figure compares with 1978-79, in both cash and real terms.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally. The number of patients being treated by haemodialysis in the United Kingdom rose from 2,883 on 31 December 1978 to 3,708 on 31 December 1982, the most recent date for which information is available. It has been estimated that the capital cost of a kidney machine is between £5,500 and £8,500 depending upon specifications. A study undertaken in 1981 estimated the cost of maintaining a patient on haemodialysis at home at between £7,100 and £8,700 (£7,950 to £9,750 at 1983 prices) and the cost of maintaining a patient on haemodialysis in hospital at between £11,200 and £13,650 (£12,550 and £15,300 at 1983 prices). A study undertaken in 1983 suggested that the average cost of maintaining a patient on haemodialysis in a satellite unit at £8,700. These figures include the costs of staffing and consumables, the value of machines, equipment and home conversions expressed on an annual basis, and the average costs incurred as a result of medical complications.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent by the National Health Service on kidney transplants in 1983-84; and how that figure compares with the figure for 1978-79.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally. The number of cadaver kidney transplant operations performed in the United Kingdom rose from 842 in 1979 to 1,160 in 1983, and the latter figure had already been passed in October 1984. A study undertaken in 1981 estimated the cost of a successful transplant at between £5,000 and £5,700 in the first year (£5,600 and £6,450 at 1983 prices) and at between £1,400 and £1,650 in subsequent years (£1,550 and £1,850 at 1983 prices). Changes in practice since then, particularly the introduction of the drug Cyclosporin A which significantly increases graft survival, will have increased the cost of post operative treatment.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to expand the number of kidney transplants and the number of kidney machines available to the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: Expanding the facilities for treating patients who suffer end stage renal failure is a matter for health authorities, but they have been told of the need for renal services to be developed as a priority within the acute sector. The Government are fully committed to the expansion of these services and we will shortly be announcing targets, agreed with health authorities, to ensure that this is achieved.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many kidney patients are currently using CAPD2 renal dialysis peritoneal dialysis solution treatment in their homes; and what financial assistance is currently available to patients using such equipment in their own homes for running and maintenance costs.

Mr. John Patten: According to the most recent information from the European Dialysis and Transplant

Association, the number of renal patients in the United Kingdom being treated by continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis (CAPD) on 31 December 1982 was 1,136. Nearly all CAPD patients return to their homes after a short period in hospital when they are trained in the technique. CAPD does not involve the use of a machine and maintenance costs do not, therefore, arise. No financial assistance is provided specifically for CAPD patients but all equipment and fluids for the treatment are provided free of charge, and the patients are exempt from prescription charges.

NHS (Staff)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish figures showing firm manpower targets within the National Health Service for March 1985 and the trend for 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The manpower targets set for regional health authorities in England and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals for 31 March 1985 are set out in the table. These authorities have been advised that, nationally, manpower in March 1986 can be expected to be contained within the 1985 target level.

Manpower Targets for 31 March 1985

Region	Target for 31 March 1985
Northern	54,800
Yorkshire	61,700
Trent	75,000
East Anglian	30,500

West Midlands	84,400
Mersey	44,200
North Western	75,800
Total: Regions	802,700
Special Health Authorities for the London Postgraduate Teaching Hospitals	11,700

All figures rounded to nearest 100.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the figures for unoccupied hospital beds in 1982-83, and the number of occupied beds in 1982, 1983 and 1984 in (a) England and (b) each region.

Mr. John Patten: The required information is given in the table. Figures for 1984 are not yet available. As I explained to my hon. Friend in my reply on 4 December at c. 174 aggregated bed occupancy is not a good indicator of efficient bed use.

National Health Service Hospitals

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new evidence persuaded him to reject the recommendation of paragraph 25 of the Greenfield report on generic prescribing in favour of the introduction of a limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Paragraph 25 of the Greenfield report on effective prescribing recommended rejection of a limited list of drugs across all therapeutic categories primarily on the grounds that the financial benefits were unproven. Our limited list proposals cover only a small number of therapeutic categories containing simple remedies and benzodiazepine sedatives and tranquillisers. Our proposals are the result of further detailed investigations and inquiries which show that in other countries with similar arrangements savings have been immediate and worthwhile and no damage has been caused to patient care.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which other countries have limited list drug schemes;

(2) whether any research was done prior to the announcement on 8 November of his proposals for limited list prescribing of such schemes in (a) Denmark, (b) New Zealand, (c) Australia and (d) West Germany.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Limited list drug schemes have been introduced by most countries with advanced health care systems including Australia, Belgium, France, West Germany, Ireland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the Netherlands, Italy, Portugal, Spain and New Zealand. We have studied the operation of most of these schemes in depth.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how he proposes to evaluate the therapeutic equivalence between a branded and a generic product.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: When we reach final decisions on the range of drugs prescribable at public expense in a small number of therapeutic categories, we do not intend to provide a direct generic equivalent to every branded product. Instead, an adequate range of effective, alternative, low cost generic products will be available on the NHS. On the general question of efficacy, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) on 4 December at column 163.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what safeguards there will be for those patients who at present have free prescriptions to ensure that they can still obtain branded products;

(2) what safeguards he proposes to protect the position of chronically sick patients who are currently receiving branded drug products following the introduction of the limited list scheme;

(3) if he will make it his policy to ensure that the introduction of limited list prescribing does not lead to a system of two-tier medicine in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We intend to produce a limited list which will cover all clinical needs. In drawing up the final version of this list, we need the help of the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry, and we will be discussing the details fully and carefully with them. This consultation will serve to ensure that medicines which are essential for the treatment of particular conditions are not excluded from NHS use.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many firms manufacturing which pharmaceuticals have written to him following his proposal to limit the range of drugs available on prescription from the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Sixteen companies manufacturing drugs likely to be affected by the proposal have written to us.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what proportion of the range of drugs which he proposes to cease being available on National Health Service prescriptions are manufactured in the United Kingdom; and how many are imported;

(2) when he proposes to list those pharmaceuticals and inform their manufacturers which will no longer qualify for the National Health Service list of prescribed drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The limited list of drugs in certain therapeutic categories to be used for National Health Service prescribing will not be finalised until after the consultation period ends on 31 January 1985.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the number of jobs in the United Kingdom, by company, dependent upon the manufacture of pharmaceuticals he is proposing should cease to be available for prescription by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 4 December at column 166.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received, and from whom, criticising his decision to reduce the number of drugs available for prescription on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received over 250 letters criticising the proposals in some way. The majority of these have been forwarded by hon. Members on behalf of constituents and represent opinions from the medical and pharmaceutical professions, the pharmaceutical industry and the general public. Many are no more than copies of circular letters put out to all general practitioners by one of the drug companies, Roche Products Ltd.

We are also of course receiving letters in support of the proposals, mainly from members of the medical profession.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to discuss with representatives of the medical professions, and trade unions representing employees of manufacturers, his proposals to limit the range and number of drugs that can be obtained by prescription on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Full and careful consultation is taking place with the pharmaceutical profession, the medical professions and the pharmaceutical industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I met with representatives of the British Medical Association yesterday. We have no plans to discuss the proposals with trade unions representing employees in the pharmaceutical industry as we are consulting medical and pharmaceutical opinion to decide on the final contents of a list which will cover all the clinical needs of patients.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many, and which, drugs proposed to be excluded from the list of approved drugs for prescription on the National Health Service contain one or more active ingredients not available on the list of permitted generic drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The drugs to be available on the National Health Service in the categories affected by the limited list proposals will not be finalised until full consultation has taken place. In the meantime it is not possible to identify any active ingredients that will not be available after 1 April 1985.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the future export potential of United Kingdom drugs manufacturers whose products will no longer be readily available in the National Health Service following the introduction of limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not aware that exports of drugs will be seriously affected by the limited restrictions we propose to apply to NHS prescribing.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to invest the National Health Service with total product liability for drugs imported from other countries, following the introduction of limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The Government are discussing with other members of the European Community a draft directive for general product liability, prepared by the European Commission, for application in Member States. The introduction of limited list prescribing does not affect the Government's position on this.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the impact of limited list prescribing (a) on the profitability of pharmaceutical companies and (b) on employment in the industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The effect of the limited prescribing list proposals on both profits and jobs will depend on the composition of the final list of drugs which may be prescribed and how well companies are able to recoup in other ways sales lost to the National Health Service.

Saturated Fat Consumption

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if Her Majesty's Government accept the conclusion of a recent report by the committee on medical aspects of food policy that consumption of saturated fat should be reduced by 25 per cent.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, and the British Nutrition Foundation/Health Education Council's joint advisory committee on nutrition education is working urgently, at our request, to turn the report's recommendations into practical dietary guidance for families.

Hospital Kitchens (Health and Safety)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he takes to ensure that health and safety standards in hospital kitchens and wards are maintained; and if he will introduce legislation to enable prosecution of hospitals failing to observe such standards.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities, in common with outside employers, are subject to control and inspection by the inspectorate appointed under the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974. The Department is also concerned that health and safety standards in NHS hospital kitchens and wards are kept up. We have no reason to believe that health authorities are not carrying out their duties under the Act and we cannot agree on the need for further legislation in these matters.

As for food hygiene requirements, I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 29 November to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) at column 576.

NHS Privatisation (Redundancies)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many ancillary staff employees in the National Health Service have been affected by redundancies since the implementation of privatisation programmes for hospital cleaning, catering and laundry services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information about the numbers of redundancies in the National Health Service has not been collected centrally since 31 March 1981. Since 1 April 1984 our Department has recorded centrally those who, because they are aged over 50 with at least five years service, qualify for premature payment of superannuation benefits. Returns for the first six months of 1984-85 show that the number of ancillary staff so qualifying as a result of competitive tendering in domestic, laundry and catering services was 99.

Dental Treatment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department's working group with which the British Dental Association has been helping to review evidence on the cost-effectiveness and application of fissure sealing has yet completed a full report on its findings; and when it will be published.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The joint working party with the British Dental Association on the effectiveness of fissure sealants has yet to complete its discussions. It is therefore too early to say when its findings will be made public.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been listed by the National Health Service for dental treatment in 1984; what proportion of those patients had two or more appointments; and how these figures compare with those recorded in 1978 and in each year since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is not available.

Family Planning Clinics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many family planning clinics are in operation throughout the county of Derbyshire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At the end of 1983, 19 premises were used regularly for family planning sessions in the north Derbyshire and southern Derbyshire health districts.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department is taking to ensure adequate financial provision for the continuation of family planning clinics.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We regard family planning as an important element in preventive health care. As the hon. Member knows, substantial resources are already available to health authorities for the improvement of health services over all. It is important, however, that authorities themselves determine their priorities in the light of local needs.

Dental Estimates Board (Computer)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to implement his decision to bring forward the replacement of the computer at the Dental Estimates Board.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect to make an announcement shortly.

Children in Care

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the approximate number of children in care (a) nationally and (b) in the midlands at the latest available date.

Mr. John Patten: The latest information available centrally relates to the position at 31 March 1983, and is as follows:

Children in care

	Number
England	82,165
West Midlands	8,864
East Midlands	6,820

Hospital Patients (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what financial assistance his Department gives to hospital patients for the purchase of new clothing.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are expected to provide clothing for those patients who are unable to provide it from their own resources and who are not obtaining it from any other source.

Mrs. J. L. Garer (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects a reply to be sent to the letter sent to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Health) on 18 July by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne concerning Mrs. J. L. Garer, of 123 Falmouth Road, Redruth.

Mr. Newton: A reply was sent to my hon. Friend on 13 August.

NHS Treatment (Limitations)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he plans to extend the proposed limitation on treatment available under the National Health Service beyond drug therapy; and whether he is considering limitations on the availability of surgical treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

EC (Social Security Agreements)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made on extending reciprocal agreements within the EEC on social security to the non-employed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We intend, subject to the views of the other European Community member States to renegotiate the bilateral conventions on social security which the United Kingdom has with eight of the other member States, and to negotiate a new convention with Greece. We shall seek to reach agreement with each of the other member States that the conventions should cover insured non-employed people, and other people not covered by the EC social security regulations. A draft text on these lines has been sent to the Republic of Ireland for consideration, and work is proceeding on texts for revised conventions with the Federal Republic of Germany, France and the Netherlands.

Epidural Injections

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service hospitals in the London area allow midwives to administer top ups of epidural injections as an anaesthetic during childbirth.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not collected centrally.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the total amount paid to date by his Department as benefits to striking miners in respect of mortgage interest;

(2) what is the total cost of housing benefit to striking miners to the most recent available date;

(3) what is the maximum any striking miner's family has received in any one week in social security benefit;

(4) what is the maximum any striking miner in any week, has received from social security in respect of mortgage interest.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested in respect of supplementary benefit could be obtained only at disproportionate cost; and in respect of housing benefit is not available since local authorities have no need to identify separately claims from people involved in a trade dispute.

Health Authorities (TUC Nominations)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nominations for health authorities were put forward by the Trades Union Congress during each of the last four years; which unions they were from; and how many of these nominees were appointed, region by region.

Mr. John Patten: The Trades Union Congress, and the managerial professional and staff liaison group, are consulted whenever appointments to health authorities fall due. The further details requested by the hon. Member are not readily available and would in any case be meaningless, since all health authority members are appointed for their personal qualities and not as representatives of particular interests.

Alcohol Consumption

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he had taken in response to the findings in the National Advisory Committee on Nutrition Education Report of 1983 concerning the rise in alcohol intake and the increase in alcohol abuse.

Mr. John Patten: The document to which the hon. Member appears to be referring is the discussion paper on proposals for nutritional guidelines for health education in Britain which was prepared for the Health Education Council by the British Nutrition Foundation. The Department continues to maintain a close liaison with the Health Education Council on such matters.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many alcohol-related deaths have occurred in the United Kingdom since 1980 arising from cirrhosis of the liver; what proportion of such deaths were male; and what proportion were female.

Mr. John Patten: The table shows numbers and proportions of male and female deaths from chronic liver disease and cirrhosis registered in the United Kingdom in 1980 to 1983. Figures are shown separately for the numbers of deaths where alcohol was specifically mentioned in the cause of death but total figures are also supplied as some of the additional deaths are also associated with excessive drinking.

1983	51·4	48·6	61·2	38·8

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many cases of foetal alcohol syndrome have been recorded during the last five years; and what further initiatives he plans to encourage women to refrain from drinking during pregnancy;

(2) what studies or surveys he plans to initiate on the appreciation by women of risks and harmful effects of alcoholic consumption during pregnancy; and what steps he will be taking to ensure that women receive during pregnancy adequate health education about alcohol consumption.

Mr. John Patten: In my reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 20 December at column 216 I outlined the Department's advice on this matter and indicated that the Health Education Council, in the light of its expertise in health education, had been invited to join the Department in considering how best to ensure that the state of knowledge can be communicated to those who need it.

Two recent Health Education Council publications "That's the Limit—A Guide to Sensible Drinking" and the "Pregnancy Book" contain specific advice on alcohol consumption during pregnancy and the council continues to promote awareness of its advice at both the national and local level.

Two research studies on the effectiveness of alcohol education for pregnant women are currently under way and the Department has commissioned a survey on "Women and Drinking" from the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys which includes specific reference to drinking and pregnancy and which it is hoped will be published in 1985.

There are currently no reliable statistics available on the incidence of foetal alcohol syndrome.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food and Environment Protection Bill

Ms. Harman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will fix dates for the start and completion of consultations with interested organisations concerning the regulation for part III of the Food and Environment Protection Bill.

Mrs. Fenner: It will not be possible to open definitive consultations on the regulations until the Bill is enacted, but we intend to open preparatory discussions with interested organisations early next year, with a view to regulations being laid in Parliament in time for their entry into force on 1 January 1986.

Pesticides

Ms. Harman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce monitoring of pesticide drift on farms to asses the damage done to wildlife.

Mrs. Fenner: It is important to differentiate between spray drift, which is most likely to affect growth of adjacent plants, and the possible direct effects of pesticide use or misuse on wildlife. My Department already monitors the national situation for both, through a system of reporting incidents of spray drift and by investigating, under the Wildlife Incident Investigation Scheme, all reported incidents of suspected poisoning of wildlife.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those insecticides cleared for use on cereals under the pesticides safety precautions scheme to which one or more insect pests of cereals are resistant.

Mrs. Fenner: There are no field insect pests of cereals in the United Kingdom known to be resistant to pesticides.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those fungicides cleared for use on cereals under the pesticides safety precautions scheme which are known or suspected to have insecticidal properties.

Mrs. Fenner: 'Missile' (active ingredient pyrazophos) is the only fungicide cleared under the pesticides safety precaution scheme for use on cereals which is known to have insecticidal properties. An indication of the insecticidal property is given on the product label.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to (a) the number of British insect pests with some resistance to pesticides and (b) the number of insecticides to which one or more pests in Britain are significantly resistant for each of the years 1954 to 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: This information is not readily available on an annual basis for all pesticide uses. However, since 1954, about 28 pest species have shown resistance to a range of organophosphorous insecticides. Resistance has involved about 25 insecticides over the same period. These figures cover agriculture and horticulture, public hygiene and food storage.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the costs to agriculture of pest resistance in total, and for each of insecticides, fungicides, herbicides, separately, in each of the years from 1970 to 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that there is no quantitative basis for providing the information requested by the hon. Member. The development of resistance to a certain pesticide does not necessarily lead to a breakdown of control or added cost, because of the availability of alternative remedies; and fluctuations in production cannot readily be assigned to any one pest, weather pattern, or other influence.

Research and Development

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for obtaining the views of the fishing industry on research and development priorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales and I have decided to revise the arrangements for seeking the industry's views on fisheries research and development work undertaken by, or on behalf of, our Departments. The new arrangements will take the following form:

(i) Representative organisations will be invited to contribute towards the work of the review groups set up periodically by the Customer Group for Fisheries Research and Development to consider longer term research and development needs in particular sectors of activity (for example, marine fisheries, fish utilisation);

(ii) Industry will, where appropriate, be invited to participate in the regular progress meetings undertaken by working groups set up by the co-ordinator of fisheries research and development;

(iii) Existing day-to-day contacts between the industry and research laboratories will be maintained and where necessary strengthened.

In addition, it will of course remain open to those in particular sectors of the industry to indicate at any time outside the framework of these arrangements any views they may wish to put to Departments regarding their research and development needs, their views on the success or otherwise of the application of research findings, and their assessment of where existing knowledge could be used more effectively. The fisheries Departments will also be glad to consider wherever practicable undertaking individual commissions on a repayment basis along the lines currently being developed by the Torry research station in relation to fish utilisation research.

In the course of our review, my right hon. Friends and I took advice from the Fisheries Research and Development Board. The consensus of view within the board was that the varied structure of the fishing industry, and the diverse nature of much of the research and development work carried out within this sector, do not lend themselves readily to the type of broad overview which the board was asked to undertake. In the light of this, we have decided that the board should be wound up. At the same time, we would wish to place on record our appreciation of the contribution made by the present board since its appointment in 1981.

CIVIL SERVICE

Contract and Procurement Procedures

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether he will publish a report on the 1983 multi-department review of Government contract and procurement procedures.

Mr. Hayhoe: A report by the central team in the Cabinet Office (Management and Personnel Office) that co-ordinated the review will be published tomorrow by Her Majesty's Stationery Office under the title "Government Purchasing". The Government welcome the report and have set in hand action to implement its conclusions.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Attorney-General why information concerning the average length of time taken to process legal aid applications is only available on a national basis and not on a regional basis.

The Solicitor-General: In order to produce the national figure a small sample of cases is examined annually in each area office. The samples taken together provide a statistically acceptable national figure but each sample taken on its own is not large enough to be statistically reliable. To produce reliable regional figures would at present require special sampling exercises to be carried out. This could only be done at disproportionate cost. The Law Society is, however, looking at ways of improving its collection of information and is hoping in due course to be able to provide this information on an area basis.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Attorney-General why information concerning the number of complaints about delays in the processing of legal aid applications is not collected.

The Solicitor-General: There could be considerable practical difficulties in compiling a comprehensive record of complaints about delays. Any applicant for legal aid, or his solicitor, who is concerned about the time being taken to process his application may telephone or write (sometimes both) to the Law Society's area office, and he may approach the Law Society's headquarters direct. The complainant may also write simultaneously to his Member of Parliament or to the Lord Chancellor or both. For an accurate picture, complaints in each of these forms would need to be separately recorded and centrally collated. This could only be done at disproportionate cost.

Plastic Bullets (Injuries)

Mr. Parry asked the Attorney-General how many cases in the current year and for each of the last five years, involving persons injured by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland have been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland; and what action was taken in each case.

The Attorney-General: The available figures are as follows:

Year	Cases	Persons injured	Persons killed	Prosecution directed	No prosecution directed
1981	81	76	7	1	79
1982	36	36	1	0	36
1983	3	3	0	0	2
1984	11	12	0	0	6

In seven cases a final direction pends the outcome of other proceedings or the submission to the director of additional evidence. The outstanding 1981 case awaits the outcome of civil proceedings.

Figures for periods prior to 1981 are not available save at disproportionate cost.

Jurors (Oath)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Attorney-General why it is proposed to remove mention of the sovereign from, and otherwise to reword, the oath taken by jurors; and what account has been taken of representations on this proposal.

The Attorney-General: The new oath has been introduced, by means of a practice direction given by the Lord Chief Justice, to achieve greater intelligibility and simplicity. There have been no formal representations.

PRIME MINISTER

Peking Official Visit

Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to seek to pay an official visit to Peking.

The Prime Minister: I will pay an official visit to Peking between 18 and 20 December. I will be accompanied by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. The purpose of my visit will be to sign the joint declaration on Hong Kong.

Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on any initiative she may be considering further to promote trade between Britain and the People's Republic of China which she will be discussing while she is in Peking.

The Prime Minister: I see good prospects for increasing trade between Britain and China and I hope to discuss trade questions with Chinese leaders when I visit Peking.

Research and Development

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Prime Minister when the factual material assembled for the 1984 annual review of Government funded research and development will be published.

The Prime Minister: The annual review of Government funded research and development which was announced in the Government's response (Comnd. 8591) to a House of Lords Select Committee report "Science and Government", has now completed its second cycle. As envisaged in the original White Paper, Departments submitted their R and D plans to the Cabinet Office in the early part of this year: they were reviewed under the guidance of the interdepartmental committee of chief scientists. The material was also considered by the advisory council on applied research and development, which provided its independent advice to the Government. Several aspects of the 1984 review are subject to further study.

The Government wish to encourage informed debate on this important topic and are therefore again publishing the factual material assembled for the 1984 review together with a short commentary section. It will be published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office tomorrow, and I am arranging to have copies placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

HOME DEPARTMENT

European Parliament (Election Procedures)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those electoral procedures for the European Parliament which have been fully harmonised in the European Economic Community.

Mr. Mellor: None. Under article 7(2) of the Community Act of 20 September 1976, procedures at European Parliament elections are for the time being governed in each member state by national provisions.

Data Protection

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the categories of information to be found on certificates which exempt personal data under section 27 of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: There is no prescribed form for certificates issued under section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984. If, in any particular case, a senior Minister determines that data are required to be exempt, either from the provisions of the Act as a whole or from the non-disclosure provisions, he will certify that to be the case under the provisions of section 27(2) or 27(4) respectively.

Drugs (Prisons)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many dogs trained to detect drugs have been used to search prisons, in the last year for which figures are available; which prisons were involved; and how many times dogs have been used to search for drugs in prisons other than those where they are normally based;

(2) how many dogs trained for detecting drugs are available to the prison service; where these dogs are based; and whether he has any plans to increase the number of dogs used for drug searches in prisons.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now withdraw plastic baton rounds from all police forces in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to his Question on Friday 7 December at column 306-7.

Drug Offences (Juveniles)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many juveniles were convicted of drug offences in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of persons aged under 17 found guilty in the United Kingdom of drugs offences (including both principal and non-principal offences) in 1981, 1982 and 1983 were 230, 299 and 329 respectively. Combined information relating to those found guilty or cautioned in each year from 1973 to 1983 is published for all age groups in table 6 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs in the United Kingdom, 1983" (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 18/84) a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. The Government view with concern the recent increase in these figures and are taking a wide range of measures to combat drug misuse, including the preparation of a major education and prevention campaign directed at young people.

Seat Belts

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been for driving without a seat belt since January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to 1983 and is published in table 5 of "Offences relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales 1983, Supplementary Tables", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been injured during the coal mining dispute in each of the past six weeks.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is not possible to say how many members of the public have been injured because not all their injuries are necessarily reported to the police. The information with regard to police officers is as follows:

Week ending Friday	Numbers
2 November	22
9 November	32
16 November	87
23 November	43
30 November	42
7 December	14

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to receive the report he commissioned from St. Andrews university on additionality orders for goods and services following overseas aid.

Mr. Raison: The research at St. Andrews' university to which the hon. Member refers is in fact entitled "The Impact of the Overseas Aid Programme on Britain's Domestic Economy". A report is expected in April 1985.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Science Facilities

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional sum he is making available to universities for improving science facilities following the "Autumn Statement".

Mr. Brooke: I would refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 5 December at columns 360-61.

Student Awards

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the timescale and terms of reference for the review of the student support system announced on 5 December.

Mr. Brooke: The timescale and terms of reference of the review are under consideration, but an announcement on these matters will be made shortly.

Blind and Deaf (Teaching)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether, following his meeting on 28 November with seven organisations concerned with blind and deaf people, he has decided to accept the proposal of the advisory committee on supply and education of teachers for withdrawing the mandatory requirement for a specialist qualification which now applies to teachers of the blind and deaf and partially-hearing.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will announce their decisions on the ACSET report in due course.

Value Added Tax

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received from the teacher unions regarding the likely effect on the education service of the imposition of value added tax on books and journals; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has recently received a collective resolution on this issue from the National Union of Teachers, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association, the National Association of Head Teachers and the Secondary Heads Association from whom he has also received an individual representation. He will be responding to the resolution shortly.

TRANSPORT

Vessels (Hazardous Cargoes)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what his Department is doing to implement the recommendations of the advisory committee on major hazards to study the inter-relationships of various regimes of control for vessels carrying major hazardous cargoes into United Kingdom ports, operations in loading and discharging and the application of planning controls in such port areas.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that the Health and Safety Commission has accepted these recommendations and has set up a sub-committee to study further the major hazard aspects of the transport of dangerous substances. My Department intends to co-operate fully with this sub-committee in its work. At present the HSC is preparing regulations on the handling and storage of hazardous substances in harbour areas. The introduction of these regulations with complementary merchant shipping legislation will make a valuable contribution towards the inter-relationship of the various organisations concerned with the movement of dangerous goods.

Seafarers (Health and Safety)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many seafarers died in accidents on board ships including casualties to vessels in each of the three years since 1978; and what were the incident rates per 100,000 persons at risk.

Mr. David Mitchell: The number of merchant seamen who died as a result of a casualty, or of an accident on board a ship, including those who were recorded as being "missing at sea", is given in the following tables:

	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Casualties	8	19	45	13	34
Accidents	63	28	22	25	10
Missing at sea	13	8	12	6	5
Totals	84	55	79	44	49
Accident rate
Per 100,000 at risk	97	68	104	60	75

These figures are taken from the Department's annual publication "Casualties to Vessels and Accidents to Men".

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport in what ways the aims and functions of his Department covering the occupational health and safety of seafarers are different from those imposed upon the Health and Safety Commission and the 1974 Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department aims to promote a high standard of occupational health and safety on board ships. To this end its functions include making and enforcing regulations, issuing guidance and information through notices and other publications, initiating research projects, collecting and analysing data and accidents on board ships and investigating accidents on ships.

These aims and functions are similar to those of the Health and Safety Commission in respect of shore-based industries and are intended to ensure that seafarers have comparable standards for safety as shore-based workers. My Department co-operates fully with the commission when preparing legislation on occupational health and safety.

Marine Inspectors (Investigations)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the number of fatal and non-fatal accidents investigated by the marine inspectors in each of the years since 1978.

Mr. David Mitchell: Information on investigations conducted by marine surveyors is not set out to provide this answer readily. The cause of death in all fatal accidents on merchant ships is inquired into by either a proper officer or a United Kingdom coroner or procurator fiscal. At the present time their reports are examined within marine directorate and, whenever the circumstances warrant it, a further investigation by marine surveyors is made and appropriate action is taken. Reports of all serious non-fatal accidents are made direct to Marine directorate where they are considered in the same way.

Roads (Compensation Scheme)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to introduce a scheme to compensate business adversely affected following the opening of new roads, such as diversions and by-passes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no provision for payment either way in respect of businesses which may be affected by changes in traffic as a result of the opening of new roads. No business can reasonably expect a guarantee of any level of traffic past its premises. Its activity is likely to be affected by many factors, and I have no proposals for a change in the present statutory position.

Buses

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport which independent and joint transport users group (a) from within the six metropolitan areas and Greater London and (b) from elsewhere in the United Kingdom have written to him indicating their support for the proposals contained in Cmnd. 9300.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received a number of responses from transport user groups from all parts of the country for and against various aspects of the proposals in the White Paper "Buses". We are considering these with the other responses in preparing the forthcoming Bill.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any response to Cmnd. 9300 from joint transport user groups within the six metropolitan counties; and what broad conclusion was reached in that response.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received several responses from joint transport user groups within the metropolitan counties for and against various aspects of the proposals in the White Paper "Buses". We are considering these with the other responses in preparing the forthcoming Bill.

Manchester Airport

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the representations he has received from individuals and organisations in the north-west region advocating increased use of Manchester airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am writing to my hon. Friend.

Driving Tests, Keighley

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is planning to make any changes in the arrangements for conducting driving tests at the Keighley test centre.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department has been reviewing the future of the Keighley driving test centre in the light of worsening traffic conditions. I shall write to my hon. Friend quickly about any proposed changes in the present arrangements.

A3 (Road Accidents)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of road traffic accidents on the A3 in the Surrey, South-West constituency in 1984; and if he will make a statement on the causes.

Mrs. Chalker: On the 10 kilometres of the A3 in the Surrey, South-West constituency there have been 38 personal injury accidents in 1984 up to 30 November. Of these, there were six fatal, seven serious and 25 slight.

As there are likely to be police proceedings arising from a number of those accidents, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the possible causes.

A3 (Improvement)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has for improvement of the A3 in the Surrey, South-West constituency.

Mrs. Chalker: Improvement schemes at Milford and Hindhead are included in our main programme for start of works from April 1987 onwards. I hope to undertake public consultation on both schemes next year. Minor improvements at the A3/A283 junction at Milford and the Crossways junction at Hindhead are planned to start shortly. The dualling of the section between Witly junction and Rodborough Hill should be completed in the next few weeks.

Heavy Lorries

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what he proposed to do after 31 December 1986 following the agreement reached on lorry weights by the Council of Ministers on 10 May to allow for a derogation in favour of the United Kingdom from the implementation of a directive on 40 and 44 tonne lorries until that date.

Mr. Ridley: There is no agreement that would limit a United Kingdom derogation to 31 December 1986. This is a date by which the Council envisages that the conditions of such a derogation would be decided. We are not in any way committed.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is his intention to sign a European Economic Community document during the week commencing Monday 10 December which will in effect commit the United Kingdom to accepting 40 tonnes gross weight lorries on the roads within the next few years.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Serpell Report

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on the proposal in the Serpell report that there should be a reduction of routine track maintenance.

Mr. David Mitchell: Track maintenance is a matter for the British Railways Board. I know that the board is committed to maintaining its high safety standards.

Drink Driving

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what research is planned by his Department to facilitate the identification and treatment of the high-risk drinking or repeated excess alcohol offender.

Mrs. Chalker: New arrangements were introduced in May 1983 which enable the Department to identify, and consider the case of, anyone who is convicted twice within 10 years of driving with an alcohol concentration of more than 2·5 times the legal limit.

The next year should see, for the first time, a significant number of offenders coming within the scope of the prodedure. We are planning at that stage to start a study of the characteristics of such drivers to help determine the most effective way of treating any drink problem they may have.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the conclusion reached in a recent Transport and Road Research Laboratory report about the risk of being caught whilst driving under the influence of alcohol; and whether he intends to take any action to increase drivers' perception of the risk of being detected.

Mrs. Chalker: The survey on which the report's conclusions are based was carried out some time ago. I hope that recent legislation and continued publicity and education will improve public awareness of all the risks of drinking and driving, including the risk of being detected for an offence.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to curb excessive drinking and driving during the Christmas holiday period.

Mrs. Chalker: The national advertising campaign designed to bring home the risks involved in drinking and driving was launched on 6 December. The campaign is particularly aimed at young drivers, who may not appreciate just how easily alcohol can impair their performance. It uses television, radio, posters and the press and will run until the new year.

Regional Airports

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the domestic and international routes available from all regional airports in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Liner Conferences (Regulations)

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Conditions for Recognition) Regulations 1984; and what replies he has sent in response to them.

Mr. Ridley: We have received two responses raising a limited number of issues. We have considered these and replied to the points that have been made.

Compact Spare Wheels

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied that compact spare wheels now fitted as original equipment in a number of imported cars are as safe as ordinary spare wheels in all normally encountered driving conditions.

Mrs. Chalker: We have no evidence that the use of these tyres has contributed to accidents. Provided drivers use them within the limits of performance specified by the vehicle manufacturer, and replace them with the repaired tyre as soon as possible, I am satisfied they are unlikely to be a risk to road safety.

Bus Industry

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what response he gave at the recent meeting he had with the delegation of the National Bus Company to the concern expressed over threats to jobs.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has had no such meeting. Our policy will give bus operators a greater incentive to provide the transport which customers want by improving existing services and developing new ones. Growth in new services will create additional jobs.

Birmingham International Airport

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans have been made for the expansion of scheduled flight services from Birmingham international airport as from 1985.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Plans for new services are a matter for the airlines.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he intends to publish the results of the survey into the extent of vehicle excise duty evasion;

(2) if he will estimate how many cars are untaxed; and what he intends to do about it.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The results of the survey should be available very shortly, and it is my intention to publish them. They will include estimates of the numbers of unlicensed vehicles in use.

Motor Cyclists (Accident Statistics)

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of recorded accidents in Staffordshire involving motor cycles for each of the last 10 years; and how many motor cyclists were injured or killed in each of those years.

Mrs. Chalker: An analysis of injury accidents involving motor cyclists for so long a period would involve disproportionate cost. However, the following information is available.

Two-wheeled motor vehicles involved in accidents: Staffordshire 1974-1983

Year	Vehicles Involved	User casualties Killed	Injured	All
1974	992	15	960	975
1975	1,217	12	1,206	1,218
1976	1,407	24	1,389	1,413
1977	1,424	27	1,413	1,440
1978	1,431	30	1,430	1,460
1979	1,353	18	1,319	1,337
1980	1,499	26	1,519	1,545
1981	1,513	26	1,542	1,568
1982	1,467	22	1,501	1,523
1983	1,316	26	1,331	1,357

Lorry Weight Limit

Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if it remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government to maintain the weight limit for heavy lorries on United Kingdom roads at 38 tonnes; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make it his policy not to accede to any agreement at the forthcoming meeting of European Economic Community Transport Ministers in Brussels on 11 and 12 December that will have the effect of raising the lorry weight limit in the United Kingdom to 40 tonnes at any specific or unspecified date in the future without first obtaining the agreement of Parliament: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: It remains the policy of the Government for the foreseeable future to maintain the weight limit at 38 tonnes.

It is not my intention to accept any commitment to an increase, unless and until such a proposal has been agreed by Parliament.

Merchant Shipping (Review)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether all categories of vessels will be covered in the review of the prospects for United Kingdom merchant shipping to be carried out by his Department.

Mr. David Mitchell: This review is in two parts and is being conducted jointly with the MOD. The first, which has been completed, was a review of the numbers of vessels in particular categories that would be needed for defence purposes in preparation for and during war. The second part, which is about to begin, will seek to establish how many vessels of the appropriate types are likely to be available in the short and medium term and whether they will be sufficient to meet these needs. For reasons of security, I cannot give details of the categories of vessel under examination.

Dartford Tunnel

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the design capacity of the Dartford tunnel in terms of vehicles usage per hour.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to the reply, 7 December 1984, c. 311]: I understand from the Dartford tunnel management that the design capacity for the tunnel is 3,500 vehicles per hour in each direction. In view of the variation in traffic flow throughout the day and the present number of toll booths, there is currently a practical limitation on the tunnel's capacity of 65,000 vehicles per day. Work is under way to increase the number of toll booths, which should increase the capacity of the tunnel, to 85,000 vehicles per day.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nicaragua

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if has any plans to change the extent of United Kingdom diplomatic representation with Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: No.

El Salvador

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the number and the brief of any British military officers acting in either an official or unofficial advisory capacity to the Government of El Salvador; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: There are no British military officers acting either officially or unofficially in an advisory capacity to the Government of El Salvador.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his Answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 592, if he will list the references of the papers relating to the wirebird endemic to St. Helena.

Mr. Renton: Some published references are as follows:

Minister of State (Speech)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the speech made on 9 December in Paris by the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Western European Union.

Mr. Luce: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to my speech of 4 December. Yes; I have placed copies in the Library today.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

BT Share Issue

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the prospectus issued in respect of the British Telecom plc share offer was not published abroad within the countries of the European Community, in addition to Japan and the United States of America.

Mr. Butcher: The offer for sale of shares in British Telecom was principally a United Kingdom offering. It was considered necessary in order to ensure the success of the offer to make sales in the United States, Canada and Japan. Investors from European Community countries were able to apply for shares under the UK offer and the Government did not consider that the cost of separate offers there would be justified by the likely demand for shares.

Manufacturing Companies (Overseas Output)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of total production of the top 50 British-based manufacturing companies is represented by overseas output.

Mr. Channon: This is not available, as no information is collected on the production of overseas branches and subsidiaries of United Kingdom companies.

Trailers (Imports)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many trailers were imported from East Germany during the last 12-month period.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

October 1983-September 1984

	Number
(a) Caravans (trailers and semi-trailers of the caravan type for housing or camping)	1,235
(b) Trailers and semi-trailers for the transport of goods (including agricultural use)	1,991
(c) Manure spreaders	2

Source: data corresponding to SITC/R2 Items 786.11, 786.12 and 786.81 (part) in the UK Overseas Trade Statistics.

VAT (Newspapers)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the effect upon local newspapers which have a cover charge of the imposition of value-added tax on their newspaper sales and advertising; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: None. But the Newspaper Society, which I have recently met at its request and whose members comprise the majority of local newspaper publishers, has commissioned work on the subject. It intends sending its conclusions to Ministers in due course.

Cynon Valley (Employment)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effect on unemployment of the changes in the regional aid in Cynon Valley.

Mr. Trippier: The changes in regional industrial policy announced on 28 November are intended to relate grants more closely to job creation and to concentrate resources on those areas with the most severe problems. They are thus aimed at improving the long term employment opportunities in areas such as Cynon Valley, which will continue to enjoy the highest category of regional assistance.

Devon, North (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what sums in grant aid were received by individuals or companies in the Barnstable and South Molton travel-to-work assisted area during the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what sums in grant aid were received by individuals or companies in the Ilfracombe travel-to-work development area during the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information available in respect of national and regional industrial aid provided in the travel-to-work areas specified is given in the following table:

£'000

	*1984-85	1983-84	1982-83	1981-82	1980-81	1979-80	Total

Notes:

(a) Total of payments over £25,000 only. Grant payments of £25,000 or less are not attributable to travel-to-work areas.

(b) Barnstable travel-to-work area includes South Moulton.

(c) The Section 8 figures do not include payments under the Small Engineering Firms Investment Scheme 2. This information is not available below the level of region.

(d) Figures are for payments made in the postal areas of Ilfracombe and Barnstable.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many new jobs he estimates were created in the Ilfracombe development area during the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) how many new jobs he estimates have been created in the Barnstable and South Molton assisted area during the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have been asked to reply.

My Department has no information about the numbers of new jobs created. Details of net changes in employment are available but, for areas smaller than regions, only for those years when censuses of employment are conducted. Between the June 1978 census of employment and the next one in September 1981, there was a net change of minus 100 employees in the Ilfracombe travel-to-work area and a net change of plus 1,600 employees in the Barnstable travel-to-work area, which at that time included South Molton.

Metering Approval Scheme

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish the consultant's report on the setting up of a metering approval scheme under the Telecommunications Act 1984.

Mr. Pattie: I have received the report commissioned by the Department of Trade and Industry from the Metra consulting group and I have decided that it should be published. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The report, the preparation of which was supervised by a steering group, including representatives of public telecommunications operators and users, puts forward a number of costed options for the implementation of a metering approval scheme under section 24 of the Telecommunications Act. I have decided to seek the advice of the Director General of Telecommunications about which of these options should be pursued. Before any final decisions are taken I shall want to consider the director's advice in light of public comments on the report. I am therefore asking those who wish to express views on the contents of it to send them in writing to the Office of Telecommunications marked for the attention of Mr. K. Benson by 31 January 1985.

Small Firms

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the response to the small firms technical enquiry service.

Mr. Butcher: Yes. Since the service was started in 1982, more than 7,000 firms have requested assistance. The current rate of applications is about 4,000 per year.

Regional Policy

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the total public expenditure is consumed by regional preferential assistance.

Mr. Trippier: In the financial year 1983-84, total expenditure by the Department of Trade and Industry was £1,773 million, of which £417 million or 24 per cent. was spent on regional development grants and £61 million or 3 per cent. on reginal selective assistance.

China

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take further to promote trade between Britain and the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Channon: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Restaurant Dishes (Labelling)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to encourage the development of a code of practice concerning the labelling of dishes in restaurants and hotels to ensure that dishes consisting wholly or mainly of processed ingredients are not described on menus as fresh.

Mr. Butcher: I am not aware of any significant volume of complaint on this matter, but if the hon. Member has evidence of damage to the interests of consumers arising from inaccuracies on menus I shall be glad to draw it to the attention of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to increase the penalties for attaching a misleading description to food sold in hotels and restaurants, with particular reference to the description of dishes as fresh when they have been made from processed ingredients.

Mr. Butcher: The penalties for offences under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 have recently been increased to a fine of up to £2,000 on summary conviction. The maximum penalty on indictment is an unlimited fine or two years' imprisonment or both. I consider these penalties sufficient to deal with any problem of misleading descriptions of food.

Manufactured Exports

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the per capita value of exports of manufactures per head in terms of dollars for each of the main industrial countries in 1982 and 1983; and if he will explain the exchange rates used for converting the figures for the different years.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

Country	Per Capita Exports of Manufactures United States $		National Currency	Conversion Rates Equivalent in United States $

Yorkshire and Humberside

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the annual reduction in regional development grants to the Yorkshire and Humberside region as a result of the measures announced on 28 November.

Mr. Trippier: Estimates of the reduction in annual expenditure on regional development grants have not been made in respect of individual planning regions in England.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions the Minister for Trade had with Commonwealth Caribbean leaders when he attended the Caribbean Basin meeting in Miami, on the purchase of new turboprop aircraft for Leeward Islands Air Transport and the possibility of United Kingdom funding, in view of the European Community aid offer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EC Exports and Imports

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, at constant 1983 prices and for each of the last five years, the value of British exports to and imports from the rest of the European Community (a) in total, (b) in manufacturing, (c) in oil and (d) in services.

Mr. Channon: This information is not available at constant prices. Data at current prices are in the following tables.

Administrative Costs (EC Membership)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the administrative expenses of his Department he estimates to be directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out by his Department as a result of membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 5 December 1984, c. 190]: The proportion of the running costs of the Department of Trade and Industry directly or indirectly attributable to duties which must be carried out as a result of membership of the European Economic Community is not known and cannot be estimated without disproportionate cost.

Motor Vehicles

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a consumer's guide to new motor vehicles offered for sale in the United Kingdom, specifying the approximate proportion by value of British manufactures.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 6 December 1984, c. 244]: Information about the United Kingdom content of new motor vehicles is provided to my Department on a commercially confidential basis. I am therefore unable to publish such a guide.

Polyurethane (Joint Ventures)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning ventures which have been jointly undertaken by chemical groups in the United Kingdom with enterprises in member countries of COMECON for the purpose of producing polyurethane for domestic and export markets.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 315]: I am not aware that any chemical group in the United Kingdom is or has been involved jointly with any enterprise in a member country of COMECON in a venture for the production of polyurethane for domestic or export purposes.

Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd. (Pension Fund)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements for the Vosper Shiprepairers Limited pension fund will be made following privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 315]: Vosper Shiprepair Ltd. employees are currently members of the British Shipbuilders pension scheme. Pension arrangements following privatisation will be a matter for the new owners of the company. The employees will be able to remain members of the British Shipbuilders pension scheme for a limited period while any new pension arrangements are introduced.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Urban Development Grant

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for urban development grant have been received to date since the scheme was introduced (a) from Belfast and (b) from Londonderry; what is the total expenditure paid out in grants for (a) Belfast and (b) Londonderry; and if the Department of the Environment has given consideration to extending the scheme to other areas in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information to 30 November 1984 is as follows:

	Applications received	Grant paid £ million
Belfast	583	1·5
Londonderry	161	0·1

In addition, offers of grant totalling 3·5 million in Belfast and £0·4 million in Londonderry have been made.

The scheme is targeted towards areas of greatest need and I do not consider it should be extended.

Divis Flats, Belfast

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland has approved the demolition of Divis flats in Belfast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Following a review of priority and difficult to let estates, carried out by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, I have approved the demolition of the St. Brendan's and Pound blocks of flats, a total of 87 units of accommodation, as part of a package of proposals to improve living conditions. It is not intended to demolish the remaining eight blocks of flats in the Divis complex.

RUC (Internal Security)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Her Majesty's Government have received any representations from senior officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary advocating the standing down of the Ulster Defence Regiment and charging the Royal Ulster Constabulary with total responsibility for internal security throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: No.

Security Forces (Plastic Bullets)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many members of the security forces in the current year, and for each of the last five years, have been (a) charged with criminal offences or (b) disciplined as a result of incidents in Northern Ireland involving injuries to persons caused by the use of plastic bullets;

(2) how many persons have been injured by the use of plastic baton rounds in the Province to the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

UDR (Firearms Certificates)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its reserve, currently hold private firearms certificates.

Mr. Scott: 866.

SCOTLAND

Peterhead Prison

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate allegations made by the Peterhead prisoners' support committee in Glasgow of assaults by prison warders on inmates and destruction of their property.

Mr. Ancram: The Peterhead prisoners' support committee has not brought any such allegations to my attention. If this committee wishes to make allegations of criminal conduct by prison officers it should bring them to the attention of the police or the procurator fiscal. My right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate has overall responsibility for the investigation of allegations of crime in Scotland.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to alleviate problems resulting from overcrowding of cells, to reduce censorship of letters and to assess the necessity of the installation of new control units in Peterhead prison.

Mr. Ancram: Measures to remedy overcrowding in the Scottish penal system are already in hand and, provided the inmate population does not rise significantly above its present level, overcrowding should be virtually eliminated when phase II of Shotts prison becomes available for occupation early in 1987. Censorship of mail was abolished at two young offenders' institutions last year and the need for censorship where it is currently undertaken will be kept under review. There are no control units in Peterhead prison and we see no reason to introduce them. I am satisfied that the new 10-cell unit and the new regime for 'B' hall at Peterhead prison are necessary. These measures have been taken for the benefit both of the staff and the majority of the prisoners, who wish to serve their sentences quietly.

Remoter Rural Areas (Strathclyde)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received details of the work of the joint working party comprising Startclyde regional council and Argyll and Bute, Clydesdale, Cumnock and Doon Valley, Cunninghame, Dumbarton, Kyle and Carrick and Monklands district councils to examine the problems of remoter rural areas in Strathclyde; if he will consider their proposals for a rural aid fund for Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend is aware of the work of the joint working party, but has not received formal proposals.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of fishing vessels of 26 metres or over, in respect of each European Community country eligible to fish for demersal species in the north of Scotland box, which were actually observed fishing there in the period April to October.

Mr. John MacKay: Details are given below of the number of different vessels which, in accordance with Community regulations, reported that they were entering the north of Scotland box to fish for demersal species in that period.

Health Boards (Staff)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of (a) hospital doctors, (b) hospital dentists, (c) community doctors and (d) community dentists employed by each of the Scottish health boards at (i) 30 September 1975, (ii) 30 September 1979 and (iii) 30 September 1982.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers requested, expressed in whole-time equivalent terms, are set out in the table below:

Teachers' Salaries (Review)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will set up an independent review of teachers' salaries.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend on 5 December 1984, column 333, to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg.)

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners on strike returned to work for the first time in the weeks commencing 12, 19 and 26 November, respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that the number of employees of the board represented by the NUM who returned to work for the first time since joining the strike were as follows:—

Week commencing 12 November: 5,032.
19 November: 5,959.
26 November: 2,159.

Civil Plutonium

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from Mr. John Lyons, General Secretary of the Electrical Power Engineers' Association, concerning the use made by the United States of America of exported British civil plutonium; what response he will be making; if he will publish the representations and his response in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Mr. Lyons wrote to my right hon. Friend on 30 November. He enclosed his correspondence with United States Congressman Richard Ottinger. My right hon. Friend replied on 5 December. Copies of Mr. Lyons' letter, the enclosures and the reply have been placed in the Library.

Coal Production

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much coal has been produced in each of the past six weeks.

Mr. Peter Walker: The latest available figures for coal production were published in a Department of Energy press notice on 5 December 1984. They show that 3·5 million tonnes of coal were produced in October.

Since the end of October 16,300 former strikers have returned to work, and another nine pits have started producing coal. There are now 64 pits where coal is being produced.

THE ARTS

Government Expenditure

31. Mr. Canavan asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what recent representations the Minister for the Arts has received about Government spending on the arts.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend has received no general representations of this kind recently.

Local Government Reform

35. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council what plans the Minister for the Arts has for the continuation of Thames day, south bank weekend, and the open foyer policy at the Royal Festival Hall.

Mr. Waldegrave: The London borough councils will be free to organise events such as Thames day and the south bank weekend after the abolition of the GLC. The consent of the Arts Council would be required for the use of the South Bank complex for these events. The future of the "open foyer" policy at the Royal Festival Hall will be a matter for the Arts Council.

Royal Opera House

36. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will publish in the Official Report a breakdown of the application by the Royal Opera House of Government funds made available to it through the Arts Council in each of the last three years.

Mr. Waldegrave: The following is the information:

The Royal Opera House meets its expenditure out of total income which falls into three categories:

	1981-82 £ million	1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million
Arts Council funding	9·3	10·4	11·3
Other grants and donations	1·0	1·0	1·5
Income from box-office, etc.	6·2	6·6	7·1
	16·5	18·0	19·9

This total income was applied thus:

	£ million	£ million	£ million
Performance and rehearsal	7·3	8·4	9·4
Production and staging	4·6	4·6	5·1
Premises	1·1	1·3	1·3
Front-of-house	0·6	0·7	0·7
Other general costs	1·8	2·0	2·2
Touring	1·1	1·0	1·2
Overall expenditure	16·5	18·0	19·9

Arts Council

Mr. Arnold asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what is the total of forward financial commitment made to date by the Arts Council in respect of the financial year 1985-86; and if he will indicate (a) how much is a firm contractual commitment and (b) how much is in any respect provisional.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Arts Council has discussed possible fundings for 1985-86 with a large number of arts bodies, but has not committed itself to disburse money which has not yet been voted by Parliament.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

Forestry Commission

27. Mr. Canavan asked the right hon. Member for Taunton answering on behalf of the Public Accounts Commission what is the estimated cost to the National Audit Office in the current financial year of auditing the accounts of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. du Cann: The Forestry Commission produces two accounts each year, the Appropriation Account relating to the funds voted by Parliament for the commission as a whole, and separate trading accounts for its forestry management activities which are published in its annual report. The estimated cost in the current financial year of auditing these accounts, together with value for money examinations under the National Audit Act 1983, amounts to £86,000, of which about half is reimbursed by the Forestry Commission in respect of the trading accounts.

WALES

Investment

12. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many inquiries about investment he has received in the last 12 months from possible foreign investors originating in (a) the United States of America, (b) Japan, (c) the European Economic Community and (d) other countries.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: During the last 12 months WINvest—the organisation responsible for co-ordinting inward investment—received 264 inquiries consisting of 166 from the United States of America, six from Japan, 49 from the European Economic Community and 43 from other countries.

Education

13. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of education in Wales.

21. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the level of financial provision for education in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There will always be room for improvements in the education system, and I would encourage authorities to make very effort to get value for money and maximum benefit from the resources available. In real terms local authority spending on education in Wales, excluding school meals and milk, was almost exactly the same in 1983-84 as in 1976-77, despite a significant decline in pupil numbers.

Coal Industry Dispute

14. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board; and if the current dispute in the industry was a matter discussed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am kept well informed about the progress of the current dispute although I have not met the chairman formally since it began.

A465 (Glynneath and Aberdulais)

15. Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he has made in arriving at a decision concerning the construction of the section of the A465 trunk road between Glynneath and Aberdulais; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: When my right hon. Friend saw the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) earlier this year, he acknowledged the need for improvement of the A465 at this point, but he explained that it was necessary to reduce the cost of the proposed scheme in order to improve its economic viability. My Department is continuing to seek ways of doing so and a decision will be taken as soon as possible.

Garden Festival

16. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to invite applications to host the garden festival to be held in Wales 1992.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Early in the new year.

Dairy Industry

18. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the dairy industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 15 November, at columns 325-26.

Labour Statistics

19. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what the latest unemployment figures are for Gwynedd; and how this compares with the figures five years ago.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 8 November 1984, there were 15,033 unemployed claimants in Gwynedd. In November 1979 the registrant-based figure, which is not comparable, was 7,142.

Welsh Language

20. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to improve the legal and educational status of the Welsh language.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has responded positively to the desire to enhance the status of the Welsh language, as is shown by the quadrupling of financial support for the language since 1979. I am not convinced that legislation would enhance the broad support the language now attracts.

Freeport (Cardiff)

22. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the freeport experiment in Cardiff.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In common with the other five freeports in the United Kingdom, Cardiff freeport was formally designated on 6 August 1984, initially for a period of seven years. I understand from the operators that considerable interest has been shown in the freeport. Some 200 inquiries have already been received.

Advanced Technology

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up special organisations or machinery to attract into Wales sophisticated industries with advanced technology and to encourage the contribution of university colleges in this area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In January 1983 I announced the establishment of WINvest which is responsible for attracting into Wales inward investment including, though not confined to, high technology companies. WINvest works closely and effectively with other bodies which have a contribution to make in this respect, not least, where appropriate, university colleges.

Earlier this year, following a proposal I made, WINtech was set up by the Welsh Developmeent Agency. WINtech's main objectives are to encourage the development of new products and adaptation to technological change within Welsh industry; to encourage innovation through co-operation between industry and institutions of higher education; and to support WINvest in encouraging new investment in Wales by high technology companies.

Advance Factories

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many advance factories have been erected in Wales, in the county of south Glamorgan and in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan, respectively, from 1979 to the latest convenient date; how many are planned for completion during the next two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the period May 1979 to November 1984 inclusive, the Welsh Development Agency, Development Board for Rural Wales and Cwmbran Development Corporation have built a total of 1,400 advance factories in Wales. Of this number the WDA constructed 117 units in the county of South Glamorgan and 33 units in the Vale of Glamorgan. It is not possible to forecast accurately the number of advance factories that may be provided over the next two years. However, at present the three bodies together have a total of 250 advance units that are either being built or have been approved for construction in Wales.

These figures do not include local authority or private sector factory provision. Advance factory building has made, and will continue to make, an important contribution to improving the industrial infrastructure of Wales and to the attraction of new industries and employment opportunities.

Dairy Quotas

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to review the Welsh dairy sector and take steps to inaugurate an improved dairy quota.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: All sectors of the industry are reviewed every year in consultation with the unions as part of the annual review procedure. We are continually monitoring the implementation and effects of dairy quotas and measures taken by the Government to ease the position of producers.

Integrated Operations Area

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales on what basis he considered worthwhile a submission to the European regional development fund supporting the concept of an integrated operations area for Clwyd.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A study into the feasibility of an integrated operation in Clwyd was commissioned from independent consultants by Clwyd county council, with financial assistance from the European Commission, and is one of several studies supported by the Commission with a view to clarifying the nature and relevance of integrated development in different areas. I welcome the initiative.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what views were expressed by the European Commission regarding the concept of an integrated operations area in south-east Wales on the most recent occasions that he has been in contact with them;

(2) if he still supports the concept of an integrated operations area in south-east Wales; and what plans exist to help bring it about.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The concept of integrated operations in the Community remains under discussion, and in our contacts with the Commission an important aim has been to identify the ways in which the concept could apply in Wales. The provisional draft document relating to industrial south Wales submitted to the Commission in 1980 formed an early stage in this overall process. While no firm conclusions have yet been reached, we remain ready to see progress on any initiative which would increase the effective application of Community aid to Wales.

EMPLOYMENT

Miners (Pay)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the average annual increase in wages for miners since 1979 compared with average pay increases over the same period for private sector workers generally.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates from the new earnings survey show that between April 1979 and April 1983 the average gross weekly earnings of full-time male manual employees working a full week in the coal-mining industry increased at an average annual rate of 11·1 per cent. The comparable increase for full-time male manual employees in the private sector was 11 per cent. A valid comparison cannot yet be made for the period after April 1983 as the 1983 pay agreement for manual employees in the coal-mining industry has yet to be settled.

Asbestos

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of health and safety construction inspectors' resources and time have been devoted to administering and enforcing the Asbestos Licensing Regulations 1983; and how much of the work previously carried out by the construction inspectors has had to be postponed or abandoned following the additional work load of the licensing regulations 1983.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not available. Construction inspectors are continuing to give attention to other priorities including the basic inspection programme in high risk activities such as steel erection, demolition and roofwork and investigation of serious accidents and complaints.

Youth Training Scheme

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what evidence he has as to the number and proportion of trainees who were placed with private training agencies in the youth training scheme up to September;

(2) what proportion of places under the youth training scheme is provided in each area manpower board area by private training agencies.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the form requested.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of places and programmes under the youth training scheme is provided by private training agencies.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The only information available relates to 1983-84 schemes and is contained in a survey of managing agents and sponsors carried out in October 1983. A copy of a report on the survey is available in the Library.

Earnings (Statistics)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each year since 1979 for average weekly earnings the lowest decile and the highest decile expressed as percentages of the median.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is set out in respect of full-time adult male and female employees working a full week in table 30 of the report, New Earnings Survey 1984, part B, a copy of which is in the Library.

Redundancy Payments Office, Glasgow

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of talks held on 4 December over the future of the Glasgow redundancy payments office.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. It would not be helpful for me to make a statement on a procedural matter which is essentially for this Department's internal Whitley machinery.

Retraining

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if the Government intend to expand the loan scheme available to individuals wishing to undergo industrial training;

(2) how many individuals have applied for Government retraining loans.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There is not at present a scheme of training loans which is open for applications. The Government intend to introduce an experimental pilot scheme in 1985-86, subject to the response to the recent consultation paper. Any decision to extend or expand the scheme would be taken in the light of the outcome of this experiment.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many building trade operatives were registered as unemployed (a) in Hackney and (b) in the parliamentary constituency of Hackney, South and Shoreditch on the last occasion for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested, in respect of registrants at jobcentres, is available in the House of Commons Library. The latest figures relate to September 1982.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in the number of unemployed people since May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 8 November 1984, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,223,000, an estimated increase of 2,004,000 since May 1979. The figures are affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which enable some men, aged 60 and over, to receive the long term rate of supplementary benefit and national insurance credits without having to sign on at an unemployment benefit office. Between April and August 1983 an estimated 161,800 men were affected.

Jobcentres

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals have been made for restructuring the jobcentre network.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Proposals for the development of the employment service were published last month following a period of public consultation. A copy of the full proposals was placed in the Library. Hon. Members were sent details of how the proposals affected their constituencies.

The proposals aim to make jobcentres more accessible to jobseekers by opening 82 jobcentres in new locations, thus increasing the overall number of jobcentres to 1,065. The proposals also provide for substantial investment in new technology in jobcentres both to improve job vacancy handling and to help staff in providing information and advice. Efficiency will be further improved by the limited centralisation of some specialist services. These changes would reduce the cost of the service by about £8 million a year by 1989.

The Manpower Services Commission hopes to reach final decisions on these proposals shortly.

Health and Safety

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he intends to take resulting from the findings contained in the recently published annual report of the Health and Safety Executive on the increase in the number of deaths of employees at their places of work.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures published in the annual report of the Health and Safety Commission for 1983-84 showed fewer fatal injuries to employees at work in 1983 than in 1982. Final 1983 data are not yet available but it is not expected that they will show an increase over 1982.

Short Brothers

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees Messrs. Short Brothers have at each of their three plants at Sydenham, Castlereagh and Newtownards.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's employment statistics are collected under the Statistics of Trade Act 1947 which specifically prohibits the disclosure of any details about individual firms.

Unemployment (London)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present level and percentage rate of unemployment in London; and what are the comparable figures for blacks.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Kelsey (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Employment why Mr. Kelsey of 1 Suffolk Road, Bircotes, near Doncaster, is still being refused unemployment benefit after being dismissed from Harworth colliery last June; when his appeal is expected to be heard; why the clerk to the appeals tribunal is still waiting for papers from the Department of Employment, Doncaster; and what is the average waiting time for appeals of this nature.

Mr. Alan Clark: Mr. Kelsey resigned from Harworth colliery and was not dismissed. He was disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit by the independent adjudicating authorities because he had, prior to his resignation, lost employment through a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute at his place of employment and that disqualification lasts so long as the stoppage continues. (Social Security Act 1975, section 19.1).

Mr. Kelsey's appeal to the Social Security Appeal Tribunal is in connection with his claim to supplementary allowance, not unemployment benefit, and my officials have been delayed in providing papers in connection with the appeal because they are still awaiting replies to their further enquiries of the National Coal Board.

A date for the hearing has not yet been set. Appeal tribunals deal with a wide range of benefits and information is not available on the average waiting time for appeals of this nature.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Departmental Select Committees

Mr. George asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission how many visits were made by each of the departmental Select Committees, including visits by Sub-Committees, in the last Session, abroad and within the United Kingdom; and what is the total cost for each Committee for this Parliament to date, together with global figures for each Committee and for all departmental Committees for the last Session.

Mr. Beith: I shall reply shortly.

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal how many witnesses have appeared before each of the departmental Select Committees in the last session of Parliament; how many times they have given evidence; what is the rank of the official witnesses concerned; and if he will give similar information for (a) Cabinet Ministers, (b) other Ministers and (c) others.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

Agriculture Committee

39 witnesses have given evidence, of which:
- 37 on one occasion
- 2 on two occasions
- 1 Cabinet Minister gave evidence on two occasions

The ranks of official witnesses and the number of times they gave evidence are:

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal which of the reports of departmental Select Committees were debated in the House in the last parliamentary Session; when they were debated; what percentage of the total number of reports this represents; and which reports have been mentioned on the Order Paper as relevant to a debate.

Mr. Biffen: No reports of the present departmental Select Committees have been the subject of specific motions debated in the House.

The following reports have been referred to on the Order Paper as relevant to a debate:

First Report of the Defence Committee, on the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984: 18 and 19 June 1984.

Third Report of the Defence Committee, on Ministry of Defence Reorganisation; 22 October 1984.

Eighth Report, Session 1981-82 of the Education, Science and Arts Committee, "Public and Private Funding of the Arts": 14 June 1984.

First Report, Session 1982-83, of the Education, Science and Arts Committee, "Prison Education", together with the Second Report of the Committee Session 1983-84, "Observation on the Government Reply to the First Report from the Education, Science and Arts Committee", Session 1982-83: 4 July 1984.

First Report of the Employment Committee, on GCHQ: 27 February 1984.

Second Report from the Energy Committee on the Department of Energy's Supplementary Estimate for £230,000,000 in respect of the Coal Industry; 8 March 1984.

Second Report of the Environment Committee on the Department of the Environment's Main Estimates 1984-85 on 4 July 1984.

Third Report of the Environment Committee on the Property Services Agency Main Estimates 1984-85 on 17 July 1984.

Second and Fourth Reports of the Foreign Affairs Committee, on Grenada and FCO and ODA Supply Estimates 1984-85 respectively: 17 July 1984.

First Report of the Social Services Committee, Griffiths NHS Management Inquiry Report: 4 May 1984.

First and Third Reports from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the Government's Economic Policy: Autumn Statement and the Government's Expenditure Plans 1984-85 to 1986-87; 6 March 1984.

Fourth Report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the 1984 Budget: 10 April 1984.

Seventh Report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the Fontainebleau Summit Agreement: 10 July 1984.

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the number of formal evidence sessions and deliberative sessions for each of the departmental Select Committees and their Sub-Committees for each year since 1979.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

*To date.

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal how many staff were employed within each Department during the last session to liaise with a Select Committee; what is the grade of each civil servant; and whether the number employed or their grade has been altered since 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply shortly.

Mr. George asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the number of temporary Select Committee assistants appointed for each of the departmental Select Committees and their Sub-Committees; and what are their salary scales and the periods for which they have been appointed.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Specialist assistants — previously titled Select Committee temporary assistants—have been appointed to departmental Select Committees in the following numbers:

Select Committee	Number of specialist assistants
Treasury and Civil Service	2
Education, Science and Arts	1
Social Services	1
Environment	1
Transport	1

The starting salaries of specialist assistants are determined on appointment according to age, qualifications and experience, and are at present within the salary range—including inner London weighting of £1,300—£11,782 to £14,444 per annum (Civil Service senior executive officer scale) and £9,793 to £12,029 per annum (higher executive officer scale).

Appointments to the posts are made for periods of between two and four years. The present incumbents of the first two Committees have been employed for varying periods totalling between two and four years; vacancies exist in the three remaining Committees at present, but recruitment is proceeding in the case of the Environment and Transport Committees.

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will publish a table showing how many memoranda were presented by Government Departments to each Select Committee in the last Session; and how the figures compare with the average presented to each Committee during 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

Committee	Session 1983-84	Average per Session 1979 to 1983
Agriculture	7	12
Defence	54	23
Education, Science and Arts	2	25

* In addition an average of 30 memoranda were submitted to the Overseas Development Sub-Committee.

† It is not possible to apportion memoranda between the Committee and the Sub-Committee for this period.

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the average period that has elapsed from the publication of reports of departmental Select Committees to receipt by the Committee of the Government response for each year since 1979.

Mr. Biffen: No reports were made in 1979. The average interval in days in subsequent years is as follows:

Committee	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Agriculture	125	116	89	279	197

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will publish a table showing the average period that elapsed from the publication of reports of each of the departmental Select Committees to the response by Government Departments in the last Session of Parliament, 1983-84.

Mr. Biffen: The elapse of time where replies have been received is as follows:

Committee	Average interval in days
Agriculture	—
Defence	85
Education, Science and Arts	109

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the percentage attendance rate and percentage turnover of members of each of the departmental Select Committees and their Sub-Committees in the last Session of Parliament; and how the figures compare with the average for the last Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Parliament (Budgetary Discipline)

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make available the finally adopted text on budgetary discipline and the Council's communication to the Eurpean Parliament.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. A copy of the text, as adopted by the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 December, together with the text of the president of the Council's letter to the president of the European parliament has now been placed in the Library of the House. The budgetary discipline text is unchanged from the Council's common position which I made available on 16 November.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Arnold asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his future plans for the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Moore: The business expansion scheme, which runs until April 1987, is still only in its second year of operation. It is, therefore, too early to contemplate any major changes at present. But we are closely monitoring the scheme, and have been most encouraged by preliminary results, announced in the House by my right hon. Friend on 13 November at column 552.

Personal Allowances and Taxation

Mr. Squire asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the saving in the financial year 1985-86 if only the first £2,005 of the married man's tax allowance were uprated in line with the increase in the retail price index under the formula introduced in section 22(2) of the Finance Act 1977, assuming that that increase is 4·75 per cent.

Mr. Moore: On the assumption that the restriction did not apply to the married age allowance, the extra tax due for 1985-86 would be about £160 million, of which some £130 million would be collected in 1985-86.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Peter Rees: For 1984-85, the PSBR is projected to be around £8½ billion. This corresponds to about 2½ per cent. of the GDP, the lowest percentage for over 10 years.

Farmers (Value Added Tax)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what are the arrangements for the payment or refund of value added tax in the case of United Kingdom farmers; and how these compare with the arrangements in West Germany;

(2) whether the arrangements for reimbursement of value added tax to West German farmers agreed by the EEC Council of Ministers provides for the repayment to be restricted to the amount of input value added tax; and whether the same facility has been granted to United Kingdom farmers who supply farm products to the West German market.

Mr. Hayhoe: As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 30 November the special arrangements agreed for West German farmers are not concerned with rebate of VAT. The Council of Ministers decided that the VAT mechanism should be used to make payment of a special aid to farmers in the Federal Republic of Germany. Such payments of special aid are not available to United Kingdom farmers.

There are no special arrangements for United Kingdom farmers, but most of their outputs are zero-rated. Those registered for VAT bear no tax on their zero-rated outputs, and can recover the input tax they incur in accordance with the normal VAT rules.

In West Germany I understand that a special scheme is available to farmers which in broad terms involves payment of VAT at a special flat rate without recovery of input tax. Such a scheme is provided for under the sixth VAT directive agreed by the Council of Ministers in 1977.

Children's Clothing and Footwear

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any work has been done to assess the impact on low income families with children of ending the zero rating of value added tax for children's clothing and footwear.

Mr. Hayhoe: The potential effects of VAT changes on particular groups are assessed and taken into account in any review of the scope of the tax. The Government favour a shift in the burden of taxation from taxes on earnings to taxes on spending, but we have no set views at present on how this might best be done.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. George asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of copies of each of the departmental Select Committee reports sold to the public, distributed to Departments and distributed to members of Parliament via the Vote Office, respectively, in the last Session of Parliament.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimate is as follows:

Select Committee	Number of reports published	Average number of each report sold	Average number of each report supplied to Vote Office
Agriculture	3	415	125
Defence	4	605	181
Education and Science and Arts	3	531	125
Employment	3	385	125
Energy	15	508	133

Social Services	7	776	125
Transport	5	462	125
Treasury and Civil Service	13	499	142
Scottish Affairs	5	436	125
Welsh Affairs	4	366	125
Environment	12	538	125
Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration	6	403	125

Notes:

1. Reports are not provided free to Departments.
2. All copies are regarded as sold except those provided to the Vote Office on initial publication.

Commercial Bills

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the Bank of England's stock of commercial bills since the reply of 21 July 1983, Official Report, column 178; and whether short-term monetary interest rates are now above or below the level appropriate to the Government's monetary policy.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Riding Hats (VAT)

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will exempt children's British Standards Institute standard approved riding hats from value added tax and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. A specific relief for children's approved riding hats would be inconsistent with the essential nature and purpose of the tax.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why tax rebates for the financial year 1983-84 are being withheld from striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will construct an index, with 1978-79 equalling 100, of the changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions for each subsequent year for a taxpayer on (a) two-thirds, (b) three-quarters, (c) average (d) twice (e) five times and (f) 10 times average earnings for households where the taxpayer is (i) married and (ii) married with two children, assuming in all cases that the wife is in paid employment and earning the average part-time wage received by women.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 November 1984, c. 579]: The table shows income tax plus national insurance contributions less child benefit, where appropriate, as a percentage of gross earnings. The calculations assume that the taxpayer has no reliefs other than the appropriate personal allowances and that national insurance contributions are at the not contracted out rate. Earnings have been assumed to increase at 7½ per cent. between 1983-84 and 1984-85 in line with the underlying rate of increase assumed by the Government Actuary in his recent report.

The weekly level of wife's earnings assumed is as follows:

Money Supply

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the real money supply since the first quarter of 1974.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 298]: The increase in the real money supply is the change in the nominal money supply deflated by the change in the measure of the price level over the same period. There are a variety of measures of the nominal money supply. Target ranges for the growth rates of two monetary aggregates—weekly averaged MO and sterling M3—were set out in the 1984 financial statement and budget report. Information on these measures of the nominal money supply since 1969 can be found on page 80 of the March 1984 "Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin" and on pages 146 and 147 of the annual supplement to Economic Trends, respectively.

Information on movements in various measures of the price level can be found on pages 114 to 117 of the annual supplement to Economic Trends.

Chile

Dame Judith Hart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instruct the British executive director of the International Monetary Fund to oppose any proposal to approve a waiver of the performance criteria for Chile's current standby arrangement on 7 December.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 299]: No. Decisions on adjustment programmes within the IMF board relate solely to their economic merits, and in any event in this case the proposed waiver is purely technical.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been spent in each of the past five years on advising claimants on new provisions in housing benefit and statutory sick pay.

Mr. Whitney: I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 23 November [Official Report, Vol. 68, c. 524-6]. In 1982-83 the Department spent £300,000 on a national press campaign and the production of a public information television item about the new housing benefit scheme. In addition, a notification was sent to all existing claimants. Local authorities have had responsibility for housing benefit publicity since the scheme's introduction, although information is not available centrally on the amount of money they have spent.

The Department also spent £447,000 on press and television items explaining the statutory sick pay scheme following its introduction in 1983-84. A poster and leaflets for claimants costing £37,000 were also issued. The cost of advice given by the Department's local office in response to claimant's enquiries is not available.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which part of the spending of his Department shows the greatest percentage increase; and by how much.

Mr. Fowler: Between 1983-84 and 1984-85 (latest estimate) the largest increase is on the NHS where spending has risen by 7·3 per cent.

Rent and Rate Rebates

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost to public funds of includng water rates in the rate rebate scheme.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the level of disregarded income for each spouse under the rent and rate rebate scheme in the year to November 1984; and what were the rent and rate rebate needs allowances levels for (a) a couple, (b) a single person and (c) each dependent child in the year to November 1984.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the level of disregarded income for each spouse under the housing benefits scheme is not available as this will vary according to individual circumstances. For the year ending November 1984 the earnings disregard was £17·45 a week for the principal earner and £5 a week for the second earner. Details of the full range of income disregards are in schedule 2 (as amended) to the Housing Benefits Regulations 1982.

The needs allowances requested for the year ending November 1984 were:

a. £63·50; b. £43·05; c. £11·90.

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of his Department's total budget has been spent on advertising in each of the past five years.

Mr. Fowler: The table shows expenditure on advertising on health and social security in each of the last five years and this cost expressed as a percentage of total administration expenditure.

Year	Expenditure on advertising (£000's)	Percentage of total administration expenditure
1979-80	1,433	0·22
1980-81	1,109	0·13

1982-83	2,351	0·22
1983-84	2,228	0·18

Child Tax Allowances

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a table showing the combined value of child tax allowances after clawback and family allowances or child benefit for each year since 1946 expressed at November 1984 prices, assuming inflation of about 5 per cent. in November 1984.

Mr. Whitney: The table illustrates the value of child support provided over the years in question, to a manual worker on average earnings, with one, two or three children under 11, on the assumption of an increase in the retail price index of 5 per cent. in the 12 months to November 1984.

* The combined value of child tax allowance after clawback and family allowance/child benefit.

† Based on the movement in the General Index of Retail Prices assuming a 5 per cent. increase in the index between November 1983 and November 1984.

‡ Child tax allowance ceased after the 1978-79 tax year and uprating dates are shown from 1979 onwards.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the value of the retirement pension in each year from November 1978 to November 1984 if it had been fully uprated in line with prices or earnings whichever was the higher; and what would be the extra net cost to public expenditure of raising the retirement pension to this level.

Mr. Whitney: Taking the retail prices index and the new series index of average earnings for the whole economy (seasonally adjusted), and increasing the standard rate of retirement pension for a single person by the higher of the increases in these two indices each November the cumulative results would be as follows:

November	£
1978	19·50
1979	23·20
1980	27·35

November	£
1981	30·65
1982	33·20
1983	35·60

Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

These figures are hypothetical. It is not possible to make an accurate estimate of the level at which the retirement pension would have stood in November 1983 if uprating in line with the better of the increases in prices or earnings had been maintained. The need to make assumptions about forecasts, the treatment of forecasting errors and public expenditure constraints would render such an estimate meaningless.

The estimated cost of increasing the November 1983 pension rate from £34·05 to £35·60 would be £670 million in a full year. This cost includes pro-rata increases in the married couple pension rate but excludes any savings on supplementary pension and housing benefit. The cumulative cost of increasing the pension in the way described since 1978 would, of course, be much greater.

Cot Deaths

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to issue any guidance to parents in relation to the occurence of cot deaths (a) generally and (b) in relation to the possible part played by overheating of babies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Department is arranging a meeting of experts on the subject of cot deaths, to be held in the New Year. One of a number of ideas that may be discussed could be the need for guidance to parents.

Dental Treatment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he has not agreed to bring topical fluoride applications within the scope of the general dental service for children with special medical needs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not been able to agree with the British Dental Association on arrangements for including this item in the general dental service scale of fees.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he will be making available for the purpose of promoting further studies into capitation for dental services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are making up to £120,000 available for a one year pilot study of capitation which began on 1 October. In the light of the results of the pilot study, we shall decide whether a longer and larger study should be commissioned but no costings for this are yet available.

Dental Health

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he will be taking to co-ordinate the efforts of health education bodies to encourage further reductions in the level of sugar consumption in order to improve dental health.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Health Education Council is currently supporting a number of initiatives nationally that are designed to improve dental health, including a reduction in the level of sugar consumption, and we support these intitiatives.

Dentists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints have been made in 1984 by individual dentists and members of the public to the General Dental Council about alleged unprofessional conduct.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not held by our department but may be sought from the Registrar of the General Dental Council. Ministers are not responsible for the handling of disciplinary cases by the council.

Family Planning Clinics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list the number of family planning clinics throughout the following regions; the north-east, the north-west, the midlands, the south-west and the south-east.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold centrally information in the form requested. At the end of 1983, the numbers of premises used regularly for family planning sessions in the regional health authorities covering the areas referred to by the hon. Member were as follows:

Regional Health Authority

	Number
Northern	132
Yorkshire	152
Mersey	105
North Western	162
Trent	138
West Midlands	174
South Western	114
North-West Thames	168
North-East Thames	153
South-East Thames	138
South-West Thames	120

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many family planning clinics have been closed throughout the United Kingdom within the last two years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally. The numbers of premises used regularly for family planning sessions in the United Kingdom at the end of 1982 and 1983 were 2,150 and 2,183 respectively.

Child Benefit

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what increase in percentage and cash terms in child benefit could be provided for the expenditure of an additional £300 million.

Mr. Whitney: Additional expenditure of £300 million would enable child benefit to be increased by about 60 pence a week or 8·75 per cent.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act (Trafford)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to answer the letter from the hon. Member for Stretford, written on 20 September, concerning the operation of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act by the borough of Trafford.

Mr. Newton: I replied to the hon. Member on 7 December.

Funeral Expenses

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received single payments towards funeral expenses during 1983, as described by paragraphs 9.9 and 9.10 of the "Supplementary Benefits Handbook"; at what average level; and what overall cost.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not yet available for 1983. According to the annual statistical inquiry conducted in December 1982, about 12,500 single payments of supplementary benefit were made for funeral expenses in 1982. The average payment was about £210 and the overall cost was about £2·6 million. Because these figures relate to single payments made during the 12 months preceding the date of the inquiry to people still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time of the inquiry, they are an under-estimate of the total number of overall cost of such payments made during the year.

Hearing Damage

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence his Department has of hearing damage caused by portable, cordless telephones; what research has been done; and if there is any action he will be taking.

Mr. Newton: We are not aware of any damage to hearing caused in this way nor of the need for any such research.

Induction Loops

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance and advice his Department is giving to increase the provision in public buildings of induction loops for the hearing impaired; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The Disabled Persons Act 1981 requires local planning authorities, when granting planning permission, to draw the attention of developers of public buildings to the British Standards Institution Code of Practice for Access for the Disabled to Buildings (BS 5810: 1979). This recommends the installation of an induction loop in various such buildings. In April 1982 the Department, on behalf of those Departments with the relevant responsibilities, issued guidance on the implementation of the Act. This stressed the importance of reference to the code of practice when considering provision of facilities for disabled people.

Day Care Arrangements

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what study his Department has made of innovative day care arrangements for mentally handicapped people in rural areas, such as a mobile adult training centre; of how many such arrangements he is aware; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Department has funded the evaluation of a mobile adult training centre (a converted bus) serving two villages in north Yorkshire. The cost of the service was met by the Joseph Rowntree Memorial Trust. The evaluation has been published* and North Yorkshire social services department has decided to continue the service, for a further three years in the first instance. In addition, the Department is aware of a number of innovative agricultural or horticultural projects for mentally handicapped people and has grant-aided voluntary organisations providing relevant guidance.

Domiciliary Care Staff

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if his Department has given any consideration to revising its guidelines on the ratio of domiciliary care staff, such as home helps in rural areas; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what account his guidelines on domiciliary care staff take of the distances they have to travel in rural areas;

(3) how many home helps per thousand of the population he would recommend local authorities to employ in rural and urban areas, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: Our Department made it clear in response to a recommendation in the 1981-82 report of the Select Committee on Social Services that "we do not consider that indicative national target levels of provision would be meaningful in local terms and regard it as the business of local authorities to set local targets in terms of local need and provision and to monitor their progress in achieving them."

In setting local targets, local authorities will be best placed to have regard to any special features of rural areas.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the adequacy of domiciliary care staff in rural areas.

Mr. John Patten: We have received no representations on this subject.

Home Helps

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's current policy on charging for home helps in cases where the person being helped is in receipt of supplementary benefit; and what recent action he has taken to publicise the policy.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities have discretion to make reasonable charges for their home help services. We would prefer local authorities not to charge those at supplementary benefit levels of income or below for these services and we have made this clear on many occasions.

Pregnant Women (Diet Costs)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what his Department estimates as the average cost of a diet for a pregnant woman.

Mr. John Patten: The advice given to healthy pregnant women is to eat a normal balanced diet. No estimates of the cost of such a diet are made by the Department because that cost must depend upon a personal choice of items.

ICC Hospital Services

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will conduct an investigation into the recent dispute involving cleaners employed by ICC Hospital Services at the Sheffield headquarters of the Trent regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. This would be for the regional health authority if any investigation were to become necessary.

Racism (Nursery Schools)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take on the report by his Department on racism in nursery schools and playgrounds.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Employees (Fringe Benefits)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many employees of the National Health Service have been affected by the decision of private contractors to annul certain fringe benefits since the abolition of the fair wages resolution; and if he proposes to take action to rectify this.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Employees of the National Health Service are subject to Whitley terms and conditions of service which have not been affected by the recession of the fair wages resolution. The conditions of service which private contractors provide for their employees are entirely their concern and not the responsibility of Ministers or health authorities.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to appoint a general manager of the West Midlands regional health authority, following the refusal of the Minister for Health to confirm the appointment of Mr. K. Bales by the members of the regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This matter has not yet been decided and I am discussing the appointment with the Chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to which section of his Department representations about the limited list of drugs should be made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Written comments should be addressed to: Branch FPS1A, Department of Health and Social Security, Room 619, Eileen House, 80-94 Newington Causeway, London SE1 6EF.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list in the Official Report those pharmaceutical products which he is currently considering placing on the limited list of medications which may be prescribed by doctors for patients under the National Health Service;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the names of those medications for minor ailments which are currently available for prescription on the National Health Service but which he is considering not including on the recently-announced limited product prescription list;

(3) how many prescriptions were issued in the last year for which figures are available of each of those medicines for minor ailments which he is considering not including on the recently-announced limited product prescription list;

(4) how many of those preparations currently listed in the British National Formulary will not be available for prescription under the National Health Service under the proposals for a limited list which he is currently considering; and what this figure is as a percentage:

(5) how many generic preparations currently prescribed under the National Health Service in (a) the tranquilliser, sedative and hypnotic classifications and (b) for the treatment of mild to moderate pain will not be available for prescription under the proposals which he is currently considering for the drawing up of a limited list of drugs acceptable for National Health Service prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will not finally decide which drugs will no longer be prescribable at public expense through the National Health Service until after our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions, and the drugs industry, is complete. We have published, as a basis for that consultation, a provisional list of medicines that will remain available in the categories of drugs affected by our proposals. It is as follows:

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a comparison of the prices of those products which he is currently considering placing on the limited list of medications which may be prescribed by doctors for patients under the National Health Service with the cost of their most widely-prescribed brand-name equivalents.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received recently from the Dispensing Doctors Association concerning his proposals to limit prescriptions under the National Health Service to those preparations on a more limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received one letter from the Dispensing Doctors Association.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, following the implementation of his proposals for limited list prescribing under the National Health Service, a revised edition of the British National Formulary will be issued omitting those preparations which are not included on the limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The British National Formulary is a joint publication of the British Medical Association and the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. Questions about the content of future editions of this publication should be addressed to those bodies.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration has been given to the particular needs of those living in rural areas who make use of dispensing doctors to obtain brand-name products or medications for minor ailments which will not be included on the limited list which he is now considering.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These matters will be fully considered during our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry. It will not be clinically necessary to prescribe a drug in the relevant therapeutic category that is not on the limited list if we achieve, after consultation, our aim of ensuring that the list contains an adequate range.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that after the introduction of limited list prescribing, patients suffering from pernicious anaemia will continue to have access to vitamin B-12 under the National Health Scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The prescribing of vitamin B-12 on the National Health Service will not be affected by our limited list proposals.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will establish within his Department a round-the-clock information service to assist doctors in reaching a decision as to whether to prescribe a generic or a proprietary drug.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I forsee absolutely no need to establish such a service. Information on any aspect of drug therapy is already available to all doctors in the National Health Service, free of charge, from regional and district drug information services. Decisions of the kind described in the question should be within the competence of any qualified doctor.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to consult representatives of the pharmaceutical industry regarding the consequences of the Government's decision to introduce a limited list of generic drugs for the treatment of certain therapeutic conditions under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I wrote to the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry on 8 November. I am meeting representatives of the association this week.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he held with the British Medical Association before the recent announcement on the introduction of limited list prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We did not consult with the British Medical Association before reaching a decision based on our detailed investigations of the experience of other countries, on the principle of the limited list. However, we have invited the BMA to consult with us on the contents of the proposed list.

H2 Receptor Blocking Drugs

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates would be the additional cost to the National Health Service if in all cases H2 receptor blocking drugs were prescribed instead of antacids.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Doctors would not be so irresponsible as to prescribe these expensive ulcer healing drugs in cases where they were not necessary.

Smoking (Health)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost to the National Health Service of smoking-induced diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 6 December 1984, c. 270]: I regret that because of a typing error the current estimated cost to the National Health Service in England and Wales of diseases attributable to smoking appeared as "about £120 million a year" instead of "about £170 million a year".

Social Provision (Unemployed)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of the current review teams are looking at the question of social provision for unemployed people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The reviews of supplementary benefit, housing benefit, and benefits for children and young people are all concerned with aspects of provision for unemployed people. The review teams are due to finish their work by the end of the year and the Government's conclusions and proposals for change will be published in the early part of next year.

Oglesby Report

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he has taken on the Oglesby report's proposals concerning limitations on the accumulation by individual National Health Service hospitals in-patients of mobility allowance.

Mr. Newton: None. We are still considering this recommendation.

Drug Misusers

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list projects allocated funds in 1984-85 to date as part of the central initiative to improve services for drug misusers, in addition to those listed to the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 9 February, Official Report, columns 756-760, and to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East on 30 April, Official Report, columns 59-64.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) on 10 July, [Official Report, Vol. 63, c. 464-465]. In addition to the projects listed there, three further projects have been allocated funds in 1984-85 as part of the central initiative to improve services for drug misusers. The details are as follows:

Health Authority	Description of project	£
East Anglian Region
Peterborough HA	Drug Screening Equipment	3,450
North East Thames Region
Bloomsbury HA	Day Treatment Centre	344,300
Voluntary Organisations
Phoenix House	Residential Rehabilitation House—South Tyneside	273,419

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, what was the total of local authority (a) current and (b) capital expenditure expressed in cost terms in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: Total current and capital expenditure (on a public expenditure survey basis) by English local authorities expressed in cost terms as an index (1978-79 = 100) is as follows:

	Current	Capital
	100	100
1978-79	(£11,826m)	(£2,881m)
1979-80	102	108
1980-81	104	88
1981-82	106	58
1982-83	110	57
1983-84 (prov)	119	68

For 1978-79 to 1982-83 the index is calculated from the figures published in Table 2.18 of Cmnd. 9143-II (revalued using the GDP deflator) while for 1983-84 provisional estimates from local authority returns are used. The capital figures are net of sales of fixed assets (mainly council house sales).

About half the increase in current expenditure over the period 1978-79 to 1983-84 is due to the increase in expenditure on housing benefit (arising out of the increased responsibilities of local authorities for this service). Current expenditure on RSG basis increased by 9 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1983-84 in cost terms.

Sports Council

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Sports Council, stating in each case the sporting or recreational qualifications or experience which caused him to appoint them to the council.

Mr. Macfarlane: The present Sports Council members, with relative experience, are:

Chairman Mr. R. E. G. (Dick) Jeeps, C.B.E.

Appointed June 1978 for a period of five years and re-appointed for a further five years in June 1983. Member of th English Tourist Board. Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of preparing a full list, to be placed in the Library, of all organisations responding to Cmnd. 9063 and associated consultation documents, and a separate analysis of their responses.

Sir George Young: The cost of producing a full list of all organisations who have responded, and a separate analysis of their responses, would be disproportionate to the value of the information. We have already placed in the Library a comprehensive analysis of the responses to the White Paper, which includes a list of local authorities and major national organisations who have responded.

"London Housing Aid Centre"

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has considered the findings of a recent report by Shelter Housing Aid Centre, the "London Housing Aid Centre", a copy of which has been sent to him, regarding ways to end the housing shortage and poor housing conditions in London; whether he proposes to take any measures in response to this; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The report contributes some useful information to the assessment of housing need upon which capital allocations are based.

Barnstaple and South Molton (EC Grant)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums of EEC grant have been allocated for works in the Barnstaple and South Molton travel-to-work assisted area during the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Gow: European Regional Development Fund grant aid approved by the European Commission towards public sector infrastructure works in the former Barnstaple travel-to-work area during the last five years is as follows:

1980	13,500
1981	Nil
1982	100,200
1983	1,435,500
1984	426,600

Public Inquiries

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the efficiency of the public inquiry system in planning.

Mr. Macfarlane: In general, yes. Some 3,000 planning inquiries are held each year, and, while the detailed working of the inquiry system needs to be kept under reivew, I am satisfied that it operates both efficiently and fairly in the vast majority of cases. I am concerned about the cost and length of a few major inquiries, and about the disruptive behaviour which occasionally occurs at inquiries, and I am considering with colleagues how best to tackle these problems.

Playing Fields

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy not to allow planning permission for school playing fields to be developed, except for recreational use.

Mr. Macfarlane: Proposals for the development of school playing fields should be considered on their individual merits. Local planing authorities will no doubt have regard to the case for retaining such land for recreational use in deciding whether to grant planning permission.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the housing investment programme allocations for 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Pesticides

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those sites of special scientific interest which have been damaged or destroyed by pesticides in the years 1981 to 1984, together with such information as he has about the names of the pesticides concerned.

Mr. Waldegrave: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. Conclusive proof of both pesticide and herbicide damage is difficult to obtain. The Nature Conservancy Council estimates that about 10 per cent. of the 156 sites included in Appendix 5(b) of the Nature Conservancy Council's 10th report (Damage to SSSIs and proposed SSSIs: April 1983 to March 1984) have suffered (mainly minor and short-term damage) from the excessive application of herbicides and from spray drift.

Planning (London)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies he has initiated to establish how the planning commission for London will fill the strategic planning role now performed by the Greater London council; and when these studies will be completed.

Mr. Macfarlane: Planning powers will be devolved to the London boroughs, and it is not intended that the London Planning Commission will assume responsibility for functions at present carried out by the GLC. The role of the Commission will be to advise my right hon. Friend on the guidance he will issue to the boroughs for the preparation of their unitary development plans and on other matters relating to the planning and development of greater London.

European Charter of Local Self-Government

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why Her Majesty's Government, in a recent meeting of Council of Europe Ministers responsible for local government, held in Rome from 6 to 8 November, voted to give the European charter of local self-government merely the status of a recommendation and not that of a convention;

(2) if he will make a statement on the implications for local government in the United Kingdom if the European charter of local self-government is given the status of a convention by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The biennial Conference of European Ministers responsible for local government held under the auspices of the Council of Europe is not a deliberative body. Individual Ministers make their views known, but there is no voting procedure. This was the case last month at the Rome Conference which discussed, as one of the items on its agenda, the draft European Charter of Local Self-Government. I am writing to the hon. Member about the draft charter so as to explain the United Kingdom Government's agreement to its content and our preference for it to be adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe as a Recommendation rather than a Convention.

Environment Council

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers' meeting on 6 December.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made earlier today.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will seek the views of the local authority associations about the likely effect of the miners' dispute upon future rate support grant settlements, in view of the formula established under the National Coal Board Rateable Valuation Order 1977;

(2) if he will estimate the likely effect of the loss of rate income to local authorities from the National Coal Board under the arrangements established in the National Coal Board Rateable Valuation Order (S.I. 1977, No. 2083); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration is being given to assisting those local authorities in coal mining areas with the financial consequences of the loss of rates from the National Coal Board due to lack of output from the collieries within their rating area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Rate support grant in 1985-86 will be paid on the basis of rateable values at 1 April 1984.

Under the provisions of the 1977 order, the rateable value of National Coal Board property at 1 April 1984 is derived from production in 1982-83. Local authorities have recently been notified of the rateable values at 1 April 1985 of the NCB properties in their areas. They will therefore be able to take this into account in setting their rates for 1985-86. Changes in rateable value from year to year are reflected a year in arrears in the distribution of block grant, on which I consult the local authority associations.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration is being given to assisting financially those local authorities in coal mining areas who are granting financial assistance, under the Child Care Act, to those adjudged to be in need; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: This is a matter principally for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, but local authorities are paid block grant in aid of their revenue expenditure generally.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider exempting from financial penalties increased expenditure incurred by local authorities in mining areas arising under the Child Care Act because of the continuation of the mining dispute.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend will consider any representation to this effect which he receives.

River Mersey

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what approaches have been made to his Department or to the European Economic Community for financial assistance to clean up the River Mersey as part of an environmental improvement; at what total cost; and what has been the response.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: A number of local authorities in the Mersey basin, as well as the water authority itself, have suggested to the Government that the North-West Water Authority should receive special financial assistance from the Government to clean up the River Mersey. The authority estimates it could cost more than £2,000 million for the whole Mersey system over a period of 25 years. As I announced in the north-west on 16 March, we will continue to give the authority a high priority when allocating external finance. While in general, those who benefit from water quality improvements should bear the costs, it is the Government's intention to ease these costs by securing maximum grant aid from the European Community's Regional Development Fund, which is already contributing to Mersey improvement projects. With support from the water authority and local authorities, we will be sending the first phase of a combined programme of water quality and landward improvement projects to the Community early in the New Year.

Civic Trusts (Grants)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the criteria by which, in his special grants programme, he decided the appropriate level of grant for each civic trust applying in 1984-85.

Mr. Waldegrave: The grants awarded under the special grants programme are intended to assist national and regional voluntary organisations carrying out activities which further the Department's policy objectives. Priority is given to organisations encouraging practical voluntary action. Applications from the civic trust bodies are considered against the same general criteria as other applications and levels of grant reflect the merits of individual applications.

Water Authorities

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the regional water authorities in England achieved their 1983-84 performance aims.

Mr. Gow: Water authorities agreed performance aims with Ministers in the form of limits to their real operating costs in 1983-84. The performance of the English water authorities against their 1983-84 aims was as follows:

£ million 1979-80 prices
(Operating costs of water supply, sewerage sewage treatment and disposal)

Authority	Performance Aim	Outturn	per cent. deviation
North West	104·7	102·2	−2·4
Northumbrian	27·1	26·1	−3·7
Severn Trent	114·4	115·7	+1·1
Yorkshire	68·5	68·7	+0·3
Anglian	69·6	66·2	−4·9
Thames	162·0	159·1	−1·8
Southern	43·0	41·4	−3·7
Wessex	26·5	26·5	0·0
South West	21·7	22·0	+1·4
England	637·5	627·9	−1·5

I am satisfied that there has been a significant improvement in the efficiency of water authorities in 1983-84, demonstrated by the fact that they improved on their collective aims by nearly £10 million (1·5 per cent.). However, I am disappointed at the failure of the Severn Trent, South-West and Yorkshire water authorities to meet their aims and will be studying their performance particularly closely in future.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EC Funds (Ilfracombe)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what sums of EEC grant have been allocated for works in the Ilfracombe travel-to-work development area during the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Gow: I have been asked to reply. European Regional Development Fund grant aid approved by the European Commission towards public sector infrastructure works in the former Ilfracombe travel-to-work area during the last five years is as follows:

1980	Nil
1981	Nil
1982	Nil
1983	1,435,500
1984	142,500

DEFENCE

REME Static Workshops

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about his Department's proposals for a reorganisation of the REME static workshops.

Mr. Lee: Extensive consultation has taken place since the consultative memorandum on the REME static workshops was issued on 28 June. Trade union representatives have received a full presentation on the background to the review's conclusions, while my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces has discussed the issues with representatives of the communities affected and of the two workshops recommended for closure. Detailed representations have been received from many interested parties, including hon. Members, and these have of course been given most careful consideration. However, no significant new points have emerged from this process, and we have therefore decided to implement the proposals in full.

WALES

River Conwy (Tunnel)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent changes have been made to the plans for the tunnel under the river Conwy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Foundation and ground water problems in the Conwy estuary have necessitated, respectively, a 60 m extension of the tunnel on the east side and the adoption of a different form of construction on the western approach to the tunnel.

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the financial target for the Welsh water authority for 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The financial target for the Welsh water authority for 1985-86 has yet to be finally agreed. Our officials are considering with the authority the proposals set out in its October submission and we expect to be able to announce the target shortly.

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Salaries)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the request by Scottish teachers for an independent review of their salaries.

Mr. Younger: I have today written to the secretary of the teachers' side of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education in the following terms:

Robert Beattie Esq
Joint Secretary
Teachers' Side
Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education
46 Moray Place
EDINBURGH
EH3 6BH

11 December 1984

Dear Mr Beattie

TEACHERS' SALARIES

You wrote to me on 14 August on behalf of the Teachers' Panel of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education (SJNC(SE)) to request that I establish an independent body to review the salaries of Scottish school teacher. Your letters referred only briefly to increased workload arising from recent educational developments and to annual erosion of the relative salary position of Scottish teachers; but at my invitation representatives of the Teachers' Side of the SJNC(SE) met me on 23 October to amplify their case, and I have seen also various documents published by individual teachers' associations. I have had the opportunity too of discussion with representatives of the Management Side of the SJNC(SE), and I have very recently seen an advance copy of a report prepared by a working party of the SJNC(SE) on the matter of teachers' workload. I have received also a number of representations in the matter from other organisations and individuals.

I have taken careful note of all the points made. It appears to me that the case being advanced by the Teachers' Side depends essentially upon the claims (i) that the salaries of teachers have been eroded in recent years and (ii) that teachers have over the same period experienced considerable increases in workload. On pay, it is of course no part of the Government's policy that salary increases should be indexed either to the rate of inflation or to some measurement of pay increases in the economy generally. Such an approach would be inconsistent both with the determination of the Government to defeat inflation and with our general policy of seeking to limit local authority expenditure. However, pay awards to teachers over the last 10 years or so have in fact been very closely comparable with those made to other groups of local authority employees in Scotland.

It has been put to me that teachers nevertheless constitute a special case, in that they have experienced substantial additions to their workload in recent years. It must, however, be borne in mind that teachers are by no means alone in having had to come to terms with new technologies and new methods of working. I recognise that new curricular developments have involved individual teachers in increased work; but I do not regard this as a permanent phenomenom and it certainly does not affect all teachers at one time. It should be remembered also that I have already made provision in rate support grant settlements for the employment of additional teachers in secondary schools and that I have agreed to a shortening of the school year in order to facilitate additional days of in-service training for teachers.

In the circumstances, therefore, I am not persuaded that I should be justified in establishing an independent review of the sort requested. There is, however, another possible way to handle this. Under statute it is of course the responsibility of SJNC(SE) to determine the salaries and conditions of service of school teachers in Scotland. I should be prepared to consider on their merits and in the framework of the Government's existing public expenditure plans for Scotland as a whole any proposals relating to pay and conditions of service together which might result from detailed examination undertaken by the SJNC(SE). I should make it plain however that, to be convincing, a review of conditions of service would have to deal specifically with areas where existing arrangements appear not to be in keeping with present-day requirements — including the definition and prescription of teachers' responsibilities in the planning of personal teaching methods and programmes, together with the teaching, discipline and assessment of pupils and participation in schemes of personal professional development; participation in pastoral, tutorial and guidance arrangements; lunchtime and playground supervision of pupils and consultations with parents, including attendance at parents' meetings; and control by employers of time within conditioned hours when teachers are not in class contact.

I fully appreciate the strong feelings of many teachers at the present time and I want to find a constructive way of responding to them. I hope that my reply will now enable us to move ahead with the exciting and progressive new developments in teaching on which we and the profession have embarked.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Management Side Joint Secretary of the SJNC(SE). I am also making its terms public by means of a Parliamentary statement and a press announcement.

Yours sincerely
George Younger

Homeless Young People

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what services for homeless young people are currently being funded by his Department under (a) section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act, (b) section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act and (c) the urban aid programme.

Mr. Ancram: The information for 1984-85 is as follows:

(a) Grants are provided jointly under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 and section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 towards the administrative costs of the following organisations:
Scottish Council for Single Homeless	31,750
Scottish Women's Aid	27,280
(b) Grant is provided under section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 towards the following project:
Shelter (Scotland) Young People's Housing Project	12,925

	Approved capital £	Approved current £
(c) Urban programme funding is supporting the following projects for young homeless people:
Funding of Director for Edinburgh Council for Single Homeless Project	—	23,420
Independent Community Homes for Young People (Glasgow)	31,400	64,673
Short Stay Refuge for Adolescents (Monklands)	11,243	87,211
Adolescent Hostel (Inverclyde)	—	27,097
Elpis Centre (for girls) (Glasgow)	—	29,200

In addition, the following urban programme projects provide for both young and adult homeless:

	Approved capital £	Approved current £
Reception/Short Stay unit for single homeless (Aberdeen)	—	37,317
Upgrading of Peoples Palace (Edinburgh)	—	35,430
Women's Aid—second tier (Glasgow)	4,444	3,745
Redidential/Day care project for long term homeless women	975	85,788
Rehousing hostel/lodging house (Glasgow)	—	47,149
Lodging/alcoholic counselling houses (Glasgow)	—	15,311
Steps to Independence (Paisley)—Single homeless and alcoholic unit (Glasgow)	40,900	44,806

Notes:

(1) The Scottish Council for Single Homeless and Scottish Women's Aid provide services for both homeless young people and adults. It is not possible to identify what proportion of the grant to those organisations is specifically for services to young people.

(2) Urban Programme projects sometimes incorporate specific services for other groups such as alcoholics.

Travel-to-work Areas

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the rank order of Scottish travel-to-work areas by unemployment rate at the latest date; and what were the corresponding figures for May 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is available in the House of Commons Library. However, the figures are not directly comparable due to the introduction of the claimant based count in October 1982 and the redefinition of the travel-to-work areas in September 1984.

Housing Support Grant (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the value of housing support grant made available to Dundee district council in each year since 1980-81; and what are these figures expressed at constant prices.

Mr. Ancram: The information is given in the following table:

	£	*At 1983-84 average prices £
1980-81	8,598,809	10,531,303
1981-82	5,285,879	5,886,280
1982-83	1,820,168	1,900,562
1983-84	—	—
1984-85	—	—

* Using GDP deflators.

Local Authority Services (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure on services in Dundee district in each year since 1980-81 at constant prices; and what are these figures expressed per head of population.

Mr. Ancram: Figures for total expenditure and expenditure per head of population by Dundee district council, excluding loan charges, on services relevant for rate support grant since 1980-81 are as follows. Figures have been expressed at November 1983 prices.

	Total Expenditure (£ million)	Expenditure per head (£)
1980-81	12,860	68·14
1981-82	12,547	67·60
1982-83	11,627	63·42
1983-84	11,552	63·91
1984-85	*12,598	69·70

* Budget Estimate.

Homes Insulation

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report figures showing the percentage of homes in Scotland that have a loft or have access to a loft, but which have no loft insulation, or which have loft insulation less than the 100 mm minimum included in all new properties; and if he will break the figures down into owner-occupied, local authority and other tenures.

Mr. Ancram: Estimates are available of loft insulation in dwellings in Scotland with access to the loft and are given in the following table:

	All Homes per cent.	Council Homes per cent.
Proportion of households with access to loft:—
a. Without loft insulation or not known	25	25
b. With loft insulation less than 100 mm thick	58	62
c. With loft insulation 100 mm or thicker	17	13

Source: Survey conducted by Audits of Great Britain.

School Meals

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total figure of free school meal receipts for Scotland, and for Lothian as a region.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The number of pupils receiving free school meals on the day of the 1984 school meals census, held in January, is as follows:

	Number
Scotland	129,335
Lothian	12,413

PRIME MINISTER

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

Q11. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if the board of inquiry into the circumstances of the disappearance of the log book from HMS Conqueror has yet reported; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence made a statement on this matter on 30 November.

Regional Aid

Q30. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the co-ordination of the Scottish Office, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office over the review of regional aid.

The Prime Minister: Yes. Full account has been taken of all European Community considerations.

Studet Grants

Q53. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about student grants and the representations she has received on student grants.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the statement on the 1985-86 grant proposals made on 5 December 1984 at column 360-61 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I have received about 30,000 representations on the proposals.

Rail Travel (Official Business)

Q73. Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister if she will give the last three occasions for the period ended 26 November when she travelled on official business by British Rail.

The Prime Minister: There have been no such occasions.

Israel

Q95. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether, following the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affair's visit to Israel, invitations have now been formally extended to Mr. Shimon Peres and Mr. Yitzhak Shamir to make official visits to the United Kingdom in 1985; and whether any dates have yet been fixed.

The Prime Minister: During the visit to Israel of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, Mr. Shamir and Mr. Peres accepted invitations to make official visits to Britain. No dates have yet been arranged.

Common Agricultural Policy

Q103. Mr. Hunter asked the Prime Minister what specific changes in the common agricultural policy Her Majesty's Government intend to propose during the next three years.

The Prime Minister: We shall continue to press the need for sustained price restraint as the best means of containing CAP costs and bringing about a better balance between supply and demand. We shall press for the effective application of the financial guideline for agriculture. At the same time we are determined to ensure that the measures taken should not discriminate against United Kingdom interests.

Pwllheli

Q108. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit Pwllheli.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Job Creation

Q112. Mr. Sayeed asked the Prime Minister what assessment Her Majesty's Government have made of the relative effects of marginal changes in (a) income tax thresholds and (b) the employers' national insurance contribution upon job creation.

The Prime Minister: Any quantitative assessment would depend upon assumptions about other developments in the economy. But to the extent that income tax thresholds could be raised or employers' national insurance contributions reduced within the context of the medium term financial strategy, both could be expected to have a beneficial effect on job creation.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 11 December.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Ethiopia

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister if she will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to increase the funds they provide for famine relief in Ethiopia by a sum equivalent to the estimated value added tax revenue received from sales of the record recently released by Band Aid in support of the famine victims; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I welcome the initiative shown by those involved in the production of this record. I believe, however, that the Government have already responded quickly and effectively to the famine in Ethiopia.

In addition to the £15 million of aid given to Ethiopia over the past two years, £11·4 million is being given for famine relief. Moreover, the Overseas Development Administration has made it clear that it will continue to respond sympathetically to appeals for the drought-stricken countries, including Ethiopia.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police (Dogs)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the use of dogs by the Metropolitan Police on the streets of central London is increasing.

Mr. Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that police dogs and their handlers have been added to street patrols to provide increased public protection over the Christmas period.

Lion Intoximeter 3000

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning the planned use of the Lion Intoximeter 3000 breathalyser machine during the Christmas holiday period.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Lion Intoximeter and the Camic breath analyser testing machines will be in use in police stations during the Christmas holiday period on the same basis as at other times of year. The non-statutory blood/urine option introduced on 16 April will continue to be available over the period.

Citizenship

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for citizenship were under consideration at the end of November; and how this compares with figures in each of the past five years.

Mr. Waddington: The number of applications for citizenship under consideration at the end of November 1984 and in the five preceding years was:—

	Number
1979	45,651
1980	53,579
1981	66,208
1982	65,541
1983	77,844
1984	36,707

Members' Communications (Interception)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there has been any change in the Government's policy towards the interception of the communications of Members of Parliament.

Mr. Brittan: No. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reaffirmed in a written answer on 6 February 1980 at column 244 the policy remains as stated in 1966 by the then Prime Minister, the Lord Wilson of Rievaulx at column 634-41, and as applied by successive Governments since then. In answers to Questions on 17 November 1966, Lord Wilson said that he had given instructions that there was to be no tapping of the telephones of Members of Parliament; that remained the policy of the Government, and that, if there was a development which required a change in the general policy, he would, at such moment as seemed compatible with the security of the country, on his own initiative make a statement in the House about it. The Government regard this undertaking as applying to both postal and telephone interception.

TRANSPORT

Transport Supplementary Grant Settlement

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has made the 1985-86 transport supplementary grant settlement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The 1985-86 transport supplementary grant settlement is set out in the "Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1985/86" which is made to the House today.

This transport supplementary grant settlement is the first to be made under the new arrangements which I announced on 16 October in circular 3/84. These were approved by Parliament on 27 November. Only capital expenditure on highways and the regulations of traffic is now eligible for TSG.

I have decided to accept the TSG a total of £320 million. The total amount of grant will be £160 million, to be paid at a rate of 50 per cent. on all accepted expenditure.

In considering the highways capital programmes of the GLC and the county councils in the transport policies and programmes which they submitted to the Department in the summer I have taken into account the extent to which their estimated expenditure on major road schemes related to roads of more than local importance. In particular I considered the extent to which the expenditure would improve the primary route network of important through routes, would improve major urban roads which carry heavy long-distance traffic, or would relieve communities of the effects of heavy through traffic. For this settlement, however, I have also continued to accept expenditure on highways schemes which were named as future commitments in previous years and which have already started, as in paragraph 10 of circular 3/84, even where they do not meet these criteria. The amount of estimated expenditure for each council is shown in annex P to the rate support grant report. Councils are being informed individually today of their own figures.

These accepted capital programmes include 289 major road schemes, 214 already in progress or due to start in 1984-85 and a further 75 due to start in 1985-86. Of these schemes 169 are bypasses or relief roads and a further 76 are other improvements to the primary route network.

The amount of expenditure accepted for TSG is not intended to cover the whole of each council's capital highways programme. With the resources available to them, councils should be able to carry out additional works to improve their roads.

We shall pay 50 per cent. specific grants in support of expenditure for investment in public transport facilities on 11 projects which were previously supported through TSG.

Because TSG forms part of aggregate Exchequer grant, the new TSG arrangements mean an increase in block grant. How the extra block grant is allocated between authorities depends on their GREs, targets and the block grant mechanisms. The associations were consulted about the new transport GREs introduced as a consequence of the TSG changes.

Seafarers (Health and Safety)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what were the numbers of inspections of United Kingdom registered vessels by the Department's inspectorate for each of the years since 1978; what were the numbers of prosecutions for statutory infringements of occupational health and safety regulations that followed; what was the nature of the infringements for which prosecutions were mounted; what penalties were imposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The numbers of inspections of United Kingdom registered merchant vessels are as follows:

	Number
1978	729
1979	580
1980	993
1981	1,020
1982	744
1983	543
1984*	532

*To 5th December.

Five prosecutions connected directly with occupational health and safety legislation have been brought under the Means of Access Regulations 1981. Two cases are yet to be concluded; in the other three cases fines of £100 and £1,600 were imposed.

In addition, many warnings have been given leading to appropriate improvements short of requiring prosecution. Statistics on these are not available other than at disproportionate costs.

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport which section of his Department is responsible for the occupational health and safety of seafarers; what is the total staff of that section; and what were the comparable figures in each of the financial years since 1978-79.

Mr. David Mitchell: The responsibility for enforcement lies with marine surveyors attached to the eight district marine offices, in each of which a principal marine surveyor is nominated with responsibility for occupational health and safety matters.

Responsibility for the occupational health and safety of seafarers is co-ordinated within my Department by a section which was staffed by three officers between 1978 and 1982; since then their numbers have been increased by one. A number of other sections regularly provide particular expertise and professional advice.

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what training is given to his Department's inspectors responsible for carrying out the Departmental duties in respect of occupational health and safety matters of seafarers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department's marine surveyors are responsible for dealing with the safety of seafarers and ships in general, and matters connected with the occupational health and safety of seafarers are an important aspect of their responsibilities. Most of them have served at sea and have first-hand knowledge of these matters. They join the Marine Survey Service highly qualified and the training they receive is therefore broadly based, but it does cover their duties in respect of occupational health and safety matters of seafarers.

Driving Test Centre, Basildon

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to institute a driving test centre in Basildon.

Mrs. Chalker: None at present, but I shall be writing to my hon. Friend in answer to his recent letter on this matter.

Trucks (Wheel Nuts)

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the incidence of accidents caused by wheel nut loosening on trucks.

Mrs. Chalker: The number of reports of wheel detachment that we have received over the last few years is as follows:

	Number
1980	6
1981	11
1982	21
1983	10

The 10 detachment incidents reported in 1983 caused four accidents and one injury.

Brazil (Landing Facilities)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the Brazilian Government for the provision of landing facilities for civil aircraft servicing the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Michael Spicer: None.

Shipping Movements

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number of movements per annum at United Kingdom ports by merchant trading vessels over 500 gross registered tonnes in the following categories; and whether these are United Kingdom or non-United Kingdom flag: (a) ferries, (b) coastal shipping, (c) one-port traffic, namely, offshore supplies and (d) international, non-ferry.

Mr. David Mitchell: Information on ship movements in the detail requested is not collected centrally. In 1983, arrivals in the United Kingdom of all shipping, excluding yachts, from foreign ports (outside the Republic of Ireland, Channel Islands and Isle of Man) numbered 41,000 for United Kingdom registered ships and 54,000 for non-United Kingdom registered ships.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were successfully prosecuted in respect of accidents classified as hit and run in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have been asked to reply.

The readily available information relates to the number of findings of guilt at magistrates' courts for the offences of failing to stop after an accident and of failing to report an accident within 24 hours and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1983). A copy of this publication is in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

Electricity Generation (Pollution)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much of the 5 per cent. increase in electricity bills referred to on page 24 of the Government's reply to the fourth report from the Environment Committee (Cmnd. 9397) he expects to be incurred in the first year and each of the subsequent years by consumers, as a percentage of their electricity bill, if the Government were to meet the European Economic Community draft directive on sulphur dioxide pollution which proposes a 60 per cent. reduction by 1995.

Mr. Peter Walker: The detailed figures are a matter for the Central Electricty Generating Board and I am asking the chairman to write to the right hon. Member.

DEFENCE

Statements of Service

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will in future when supplying statements of service to former Army personnel refrain from entering service in Northern Ireland under service in foreign countries.

Mr. Lee: No such change of practice is needed, since service in Northern Ireland should not appear in the statements of Army service provided by my Department under the heading of service in foreign countries. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces is writing to the right hon. Member.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost to his Department of assistance given to the police in connection with the miners' strike.

Mr. Stanley: We continue to anticipate no cost to the Department.

62. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will advise service men not to become involved in the miners' dispute while off duty.

Mr. Stanley: I do not believe that there is any necessity for general advice to be issued at the present time.

There has, to our knowledge, been only one case of a service man becoming involved in this dispute whilst off duty, which was the one referred to in the answer that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office gave to my hon. Friend on 16 November.

Missiles and Aircraft (Dual Capability)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration is being given by Her Majesty's Government to battle plans involving dual-capable missiles and aircraft.

Mr. Stanley: Dual capable weapons systems have been an integral part of both NATO and Warsaw pact forces for many years.

Royal Ordnance Factories

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will meet trade union representatives to discuss redundancies at royal ordnance factories.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I met representatives of the industrial and non-industrial trades unions on 1 November, and we have subsequently corresponded with them on the question of the reductions in the royal ordnance factories. If the trades unions have further points to raise, I have no doubt that a further meeting could be arranged.

27. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with trade union representatives of the royal ordnance factories concerning redundancies.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I met representatives of the industrial and non-industrial trades unions on 1 November.

34. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning ammunition manufacture at royal ordnance factories.

Mr. Butler: The ammunition division of the royal ordnance factories comprises the factories at Birtley, Blackburn, Chorley, Glascoed and Patricroft together with the agency factory at Featherstone; in addition small arms ammunition is manufactured at Radway Green in the small arms division. These factories produce a range of high quality munitions and the Government wish to see them successful in their new commercial environment. However, the current order position has necessitated the declaration of redundancies at certain of these factories although the extent of these has been reduced by the recent placing of further orders by the Ministry of Defence.

NATO Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the communiqué issued after each North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ministerial meeting refers only to agenda items which do not carry security classifications.

Mr. Stanley: No, but it is the usual practice in NATO to provide communiqués in an unclassified form about discussions which are classified themselves.

26. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will, in future, make a statement to the House prior to North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ministerial meetings.

61. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will in future make a statement to the House prior to North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ministerial meetings.

65. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will, in future make a statement to the House prior to North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ministerial meetings.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

33. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he attended the December meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation defence ministers; and if he will make a statement outlining the main decisions reached.

Mr. Heseltine: I met other NATO Defence Ministers in Brussels between 3 and 5 December. We had valuable discussions on a wide range of subjects. Details are set out in the communiqués of the Eurogroup and of the defence planning committee. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Army Detention Centres

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the detention centres used by the British Army; and what is the present number of service men being held at such centres.

Mr. Lee: Sentences of military detention are served either at the military corrective training centre, Colchester or in Army unit guardrooms, depending on the length of the sentence. The position on 30 November was that 109 Army personnel were in detention in the military corrective training centre and 131 in unit guardrooms.

Tidworth Army Depot (Custody Statistics)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of service men at present being held in custody at Tidworth Army depot, and the period of time men have been held there without being charged with an offence.

Mr. Lee: The position on 30 November 1984 was that two soldiers were being held at Tidworth garrison, both of whom were charged within 48 hours of being placed in arrest.

Service Personnel (Custody)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of (a) service men and (b) service women at present being held in custody by the British Army in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The position on 30 November 1984 was that 46 service men and no service women were being held in custody (as distinct from detention) in Army unit guardrooms in the United Kingdom while under investigation or awaiting trial or confirmation of sentence.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the period of time a member of the British Army can be held in custody by the Army before being charged with an offence.

Mr. Lee: Army personnel would normally be informed by their commanding officer of the charge on which they are being held by no later than 48 hours from the time of being taken into custody. If in exceptional circumstances they cannot be informed within 48 hours, a report has to be submitted to the superior military authority explaining the delay.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the rights of service men to consult solicitors if they are being held in detention by the British Army.

Mr. Lee: A service man being held in custody by the Army has the following rights of consultation with a solicitor.

(a) he may name a solicitor as the person he wishes to be informed by the Army of his arrest and the place where he is being held.

(b) provided that the investigation or prevention of crime, the apprehension of offenders or military operations, safety and security would not be unreasonably hindered, he may telephone a solicitor at his own expense or receive telephone calls from him at reasonable times.

(c) with the commanding officer's permission he may be visited by a solicitor.

Information Services

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a breakdown of the cost to his Department in the last financial year of the provision of presentations comprising information films, lectures and exhibitions to selected groups and to the public in general.

Mr. Butler: Ministers, service officers and officials regularly give public presentations and lectures on a wide range of defence issues. It is not possible to assess the cost of such presentations without disproportionate effort. In 1983-84 the cost of service recruiting and public relations films and exhibitions amounted to about £2·5 million. The cost of the RN and RAF presentation teams amounted to about £0.5 million, including manpower costs.

64. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual cost of his Department's information service.

Mr. Lee: The cost of defence public relations worldwide amounted to some £6·2 million in 1983-84. This figure includes expenditure on public relations activities together with staff and related costs.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the military equipment of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, listing separately firearms and the type of firearms, motor vehicles, armoured vehicles and type and number of radio, radar and electronics surveillance equipment with which the regiment is equipped today and in each year since its inception.

Mr. Lee: The information is not maintained in the form requested. However, the current establishment of weapons and vehicles for the Ulster Defence Regiment is as follows:

	Number
·22 Rifles	222
9mm Pistol	642
9mm SMG	110
7·62mm SLR	8,409

	Number
GPMG/LMG	184
Landrovers	249
Recruiting Trailer	1
Trailers	61
4 Ton Trucks	10
Other vehicles	228

Other equipment can be issued when commitments or circumstances dictate. The radio allocation varies from week to week, dependent upon the tasks and commitments of each battalion.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the percentages of Catholics and Protestants who have served in the Ulster Defence Regiment for each year since the regiment's inception.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to his question of 13 March this year, at column 129. The position has not changed since then. Information for earlier years is not available.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many regular officers are currently attached to the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Lee: The figure is 34.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many regular soldiers are currently attached to the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Lee: The figure is 67.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the current morale of the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Lee: The morale of the Ulster Defence Regiment is high.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to change the role of the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Lee: No. The Ulster Defence Regiment will continue to play a full part in the Army's overall effort in support of the RUC in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been killed or maimed this year whilst carrying out their duties; how many were off duty; and how many were full-time and part-time, respectively.

Mr. Lee: Up to 30 November, 10 soldiers have been killed, of whom two were on duty and eight were off duty, and one was full-time and nine part-time. Nine soldiers have been injured, of whom four were on duty and five were off duty, and three were full-time and six were part-time.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, since its inception have been found to be members of illegal paramilitary organisations or, separately, legal paramilitary organisations such as the Ulster Defence Association or the Third Force.

Mr. Lee: The information is not maintained in the form requested, but during the last five years — the only period for which information is available—there are no records of serving members of the UDR being convicted of membership of any organisation proscribed under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current policy concerning the possession of firearms at their domiciles by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and its Reserve.

Mr. Lee: UDR personnel who are under threat can be issued with a personal protection weapon on the authority of the commander UDR. All applications for PPWs are subject to rigorous scrutiny. If the UDR member issued with a PPW leaves Northern Ireland or is absent from home for over 24 hours the weapon has to be returned. In addition, UDR personnel may apply to the RUC for a private firearms certificate in the same way as any other resident of Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the costs of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, divided between wages and salaries, other personnel costs, costs of construction and buildings, investment in military equipment and other costs for each year since the regiment's inception.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

Financial year	Wages/ salaries £ million	Construction/ buildings £ million	Equipment £ million	Support costs £ million	Total £ million
1971-72	0·9	—	—	0·1	1·0
1972-73	2·3	2·5	—	0·3	5·1
1973-74	6·0	1·4	0·2	0·4	8·0
1974-75	6·4	1·4	0·6	0·3	8·7
1975-76	6·88	—	0·43	0·42	7·73
1976-77	10·63	0·21	0·31	0·58	11·73
1977-78	13·01	0·42	0·92	0·78	15·13
1978-79	15·07	0·31	0·88	0·85	17·11
1979-80	20·04	0·05	1·03	1·12	22·24
1980-81	24·77	—	1·10	1·26	27·13
1981-82	33·2	—	0·9	1·2	35·3
1982-83	33·1	—	1·10	1·7	35·9
1983-84	36·1	—	1·2	1·8	39·1

The above figures are those which appeared in the Estimates for each financial year. Figures for 1984-85 are not yet available, and those prior to 1971-72 were not separately identified.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning current policy and practice of deployment of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, with particular reference to the areas and circumstances in which it is, and is not, deployed.

Mr. Lee: The UDR, both permanent cadre and part time, are deployed in support of the RUC across almost all areas of Northern Ireland, although they are not used on crowd control or riot duties in cities.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons have been killed by the Ulster Defence Regiment operatives on duty in Northern Ireland to date; how many of those fatalities were of civilians unconnected with terrorist organisations; and how many victims there were for whom no mandate of arrest existed.

Mr. Lee: Since the formation of the regiment, six civilians have died as a result of action by members of the UDR in the course of their duty. It is not possible to say for certain how many of these were or were not connected with terrorist organisations.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the manpower strength of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, as between full-time and part-time, male and female operatives for each year since its inception.

Mr. Lee: These details are given in the following table:

(figures as at 31 March).

	Part time		Full time
	Male	Female	Male	Female	Total
1970	2,243	—	49	—	2,292
1971	3,880	—	234	—	4,114
1972	8,117	—	645	—	8,762
1973	7,444	—	833	—	8,277
1974	6,484	450	851	8	7,793
1975	5,635	592	1,414	13	7,654
1976	5,618	596	1,505	19	7,738
1977	5,332	619	1,662	31	7,644
1978	5,039	631	2,113	79	7,862
1979	4,556	598	2,346	123	7,623
1980	4,627	552	2,416	138	7,373
1981	4,159	582	2,580	158	7,479

1984	3,563	531	2,483	200	6,777

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the strength of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, by rank of serving operative for each year since the regiment's inception.

Mr. Lee: These details are given in the following table:

(Figures as at 31 December)

	1974	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Total	7,396	7,793	7,616	7,812	7,761	7,425	7,431	7,350	7,026	6,929

The figures for other ranks do not include females, which are shown separately.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, were former members of the B Specials at the time of the regiment's inception; and what is the number today.

Mr. Lee: The information is not available in the form requested, though on grounds of age alone some two thirds of those now serving in the regiment would have been too young to serve in the B Specials.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the number of operatives by rank, separately, of those who have joined the Ulster Defence Regiment and its Reserve, and of those who have resigned from the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, in each year since its inception.

Mr. Lee: The information is not available in the form requested. However, figures for those who have joined the UDR and who have left the UDR, for reasons other than medical or disciplinary or on death, are as follows:

	Intake		Outflow
	Officers	Other ranks	Officers	Other ranks
1975-76	59	1,634	38	1,214
1976-77	37	1,691	36	1,191
1977-78	55	1,931	54	1,301
1978-79	64	1,731	43	1,515
1979-80	34	1,331	40	1,236
1980-81	39	1,509	38	1,105
1981-82	26	1,211	51	1,207
1982-83	26	1,488	47	1,114
1983-84	36	966	30	1,076

Figures prior to 1975 are not available.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the average time served in the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, by current operatives for each year since the regiment's inception for each group of (a) non-commissioned officers, (b) commissioned officers and (c) other ranks.

Mr. Lee: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the procedure for vetting existing and new applicants for membership of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, to ensure that the membership of the regiment is consistent with standards of maximising its acceptability to both communities in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Lee: It is not our practice to disclose details of our procedures for vetting applicants to join the armed forces; however, I am satisfied that they provide thorough safeguards.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the number of persons who have been asked to resign from the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, in each year since its inception, indicating those who have been charged with crimes, giving separately details of persons who resigned as a result of being charged with scheduled offences.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to ensure that the number of seconded regular officers and men in the Ulster Defence Regiment is sufficient to prevent sectarian activity by members of that regiment; and if he will indicate how he measures the efficacy of such steps.

Mr. Lee: I am satisfied that the current balance between personnel from the regular Army and locally recruited personnel is the best one to ensure the effective operation of the regiment. There are no plans to change that balance, which has worked very well.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of the Ulster Defence Regiment within Her Majesty's Government's overall policy of promoting a peaceful settlement to the troubles in Ulster.

Mr. Lee: The UDR makes an important contribution to the overall security forces effort. In many cases it has helped the RUC to bring terrorist criminals to justice, and this in turn has contributed to the Government's overall aim of promoting peace and political stability in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the steps he is taking to ensure that the Ulster Defence Regiment enjoys the support of the majority of each sector of political opinion in Northern Ireland; and if he will indicate how he measures the efficacy of such steps in each sector.

Mr. Lee: The Government are always sensitive to the need to ensure that all elements of the security forces enjoy the support of all sections of the community. In training soldiers for the UDR the Army makes every effort to instil the highest possible standards of impartiality and politeness of their dealings with members of the public, irrespective of political or religious affiliation.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the number of members of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its reserve, for each year since the regiment's inception, who have been charged with offences in criminal courts and who have been convicted of offences, giving details of custodial sentences imposed, and separately for charges and convictions concerning murder, attempted murder, membership of illegal organisations, conspiracy to cause explosions, withholding information concerning terrorist activity, possession of explosives, possession of explosives with intent to cause bodily harm, possession of firearms, possession of firearms with intent to cause bodily harm and other offences classified as schedule offences; and if he will specify whether those convicted have served their sentence either in any of the six counties of Northern Ireland or on mainland Britain.

Mr. Lee: The information is not available in the form requested. However, since the formation of the UDR the following numbers of serving soldiers have been convicted of offences:

— eight with murder.
— six with manslaughter.
— eighty with assault.

The great majority of these offences were of a domestic nature. In addition, it is known that the following numbers of soldiers have been charged with serious offences since May 1983:

— three with possession of firearms.
— two with bomb hoaxes.
— one with making petrol bombs.
— one with arson.
— one with drunk in charge of firearms.

JP 233 Airfield Attack Weapon System

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the RAF to start taking delivery of the JP 233 airfield attack weapon system; what is the total value of the contract; and when it is expected to be completed.

Mr. Butler: Deliveries of JP 233 to the RAF are planned to begin early next year and be complete by the end of 1988. The contract value cannot be stated for reasons of commercial confidentiality: contractual negotiations for fixed prices are still in progress.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to encourage the United States Government to purchase the JP 233 airfield attack weapon system or to arrange for its production under licence in the United States of America.

Mr. Butler: Since the United States withdrew from a joint United Kingdom-United States development programme for JP 233 in 1981, Hunting Engineering Ltd. the prime contractor, has been fully supported by the Ministry of Defence in the marketing of the JP 233 weapon system in America.

It remains uncertain whether the United States air force will procure the complete JP 233 system. However, there is serious interest at the sub-system level.

The MOD will continue to assist Hunting Engineering and the other United Kingdom contractors involved in the programme in the promotion of the JP 233.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to exploit the export potential of the JP 233 airfield attack weapon system.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I have given to his earlier question as regards exploitation of the weapon in the United States. My Ministry has also given the manufacturer approval and encouragement to promote sales to a number of other countries.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many jobs in the United Kingdom are estimated to be involved in the production of the JP 233 airfield attack weapon system.

Mr. Butler: At peak production levels the project is expected to provide direct employment for about 4,000 people in the United Kingdom.

Northern Europe Tracking Station

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the planned location and function of the Northern Europe tracking station which the United States air force plans to establish in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The proposed Northern Europe tracking station would be part of a modernisation of the United States worldwide satellite tracking network. As the House was informed on 28 June, we have already approved one joint Anglo-American project to establish a communications antenna at RAE Oakhangar, to enhance the existing co-operation between ourselves and the United States in the field of satellite communications, in particular in support of the Skynet 4 satellite project and the space shuttle. The possibility of a second Anglo-American project to establish a further tracking dish at Oakhangar is still under consideration.

Military Helicopters (Nap-of-the-Earth Flying Areas)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those areas in the United Kingdom which are designated specially for nap-of-the-earth flying by Army or Marines' helicopters; and whether any consultations took place with local authorities over the designation of these areas.

Mr. Lee: I assume that by "nap-of-the-earth" flying the right hon. Member is referring to low flying. All of the United Kingdom may be used by Army and Royal Marines helicopters for low flying subject to the usual restrictions. Consultations with local authorities are, therefore, not appropriate.

Submarine Exercises

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the coastguard is informed of the timing and location of British and American submarine exercises in British coastal waters.

Mr. Stanley: No. For reasons of operational security, it has long been Ministry of Defence policy not to disclose Royal Navy submarine movements nor to comment on foreign submarine activity. However, areas around the United Kingdom where submarines of the Royal Navy or of NATO nations exercise regularly are marked on Admiralty charts.

Underwater Test and Evaluation Centre (Contracts)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those companies which have been awarded contracts by his Department for work related to the British underwater test and evaluation centre.

Mr. Butler: The following companies are currently providing services for the operation and maintenance of the BUTEC facility at Kyle of Lochalsh:

RCA Limited, Sunbury on Thames, Middlesex,
Thorn EMI Electronics Limited, Woking, Surrey,
Bond Helos, Aberdeen.

In addition, the following companies have current contracts for support, repair and design-development services and the supply of equipment to be used at the facility:

RCA Limited, Sunbury on Thames, Middlesex,
Thorn EMI Electronics Limited, Woking, Surrey,
Easams Limited, Frimley, Surrey,
CAP Scientific Limited, Holborn, London,
dB Instrumentation Limited, Aldershot, Hants,
Waverley Electronics Limited, Weymouth, Dorset,
Offshore Environmental Systems Limited, Farnham, Surrey,
Slingsby Engineering Limited, Kirkbymoorside, Yorks,
STC Limited, Greenwich, London,
Alluvial Mine and Shaft Sinking Company, Basildon, Essex,
Techmation, Edgware, London,
Price and Edward Limited, West Drayton, Middlesex.

Approximately 250 local purchase orders have also been placed during the same period by the responsible technical branch at Portland.

Military Aircraft (Minimum Operating Height)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the minimum operating height for military aircraft in the Highlands restricted area was lowered from 360 ft to 200 ft; and what consultations took place with local authorities when this occurred.

Mr. Lee: The Highlands restricted area was established in October 1981 to allow practice in the use of terrain-following radar. All the local authorities concerned were informed. To date, flying in the HRA has generally been above the 250 ft minimum that normally applies to military low flying in the United Kingdom.

Gruinard Island

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with tests on Gruinard Island to investigate the feasibility of decontaminating the island.

Mr. Lee: Possible methods of decontaminating affected areas of Gruinard Island, including the question of potential effectiveness and cost, remain under careful review. A further visit was made to the island in July 1984 and initial analysis of the date obtained supports previous encouraging results. However, further work is required before a decision on decontamination can be considered and it is not yet possible to say when that will be.

Jet Provost (Replacement)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy that his choice of the replacement for the Jet Provost is the one which in the opinion of the Royal Air Force is the best choice on technical and operational merit.

Mr. Butler: In reaching a decision on a new trainer aircraft, major considerations will be value for money as well as the ability of the aircraft to meet the technical and operational requirements of the Royal Air Force. Other issues which will be taken into account will include job opportunities in the United Kingdom, overseas sales prospects and international relations.

37. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the choice of a replacement basic trainer aircraft for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler: In October and November my right hon. Friend and I received 24 letters from hon. Members, many of which forwarded correspondence from constituents and interested parties, and six letters from industrialists and trades unionists. In that period, hon. Members also asked seven questions on this subject, and two questions have been answered in another place.

Tornado Project

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what sum of money he envisages Her Majesty's Government will have to pay to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany in compensation for the imbalance which has occurred in the work-sharing on the Tornado project; if this sum will be paid in cash or in some other form; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The most recently published estimate of United Kingdom under-payments against her cost liability is approximately £250 million. If this imbalance continues to the end of the programme, it may be necessary for a cash payment to be made. However, means of reducing the imbalance such as the possibility of work transfers to the United Kingdom are kept under regular review and will be implemented wherever practicable.

41. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning export prospects for the Tornado aeroplane.

Mr. Butler: British Aerospace is currently pursuing several export prospects for the Tornado, with strong Government support, which we hope will prove successful.

Marconi Radar

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the problems encountered with the Marconi radar intended for the Nimrod mk. III aircraft; and when he expects them to be overcome.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 29 October, at column 854.

Air Defence Network

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current effectiveness of the United Kingdom air defence network.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to paragraphs 409-412 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984".

As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement said on 29 October, at column 854, it is taking longer than originally anticipated to commission the Nimrod airborne early-warning aircraft.

Trident Missile

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the offset agreements with the United States of America on the Trident programme.

Mr. Butler: There is no offset agreement. Given the strategic nature of the project, there was no question of guaranteeing United Kingdom industry a specific proportion of the work. The industrial participation arrangements negotiated when the UK decided to purchase the Trident II missile do, however, permit United Kingdom industry to compete for Trident II subcontracts, in support of both United States and United Kingdom requirements, on equal terms with their United States counterparts.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many British firms have made bids for component work on the Trident programme.

Mr. Butler: Up to the end of June 1984, the last period for which we have data, 107 United Kingdom firms had been invited to bid for contracts on the United States Trident II programme. Of these, only 37 made bids.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many contracts have been won by United Kingdom companies and which contracts for component work on the Trident programme; and what is the estimated value of these contracts collectively and individually.

Mr. Butler: Twenty six contracts on the United States Trident II programme have been placed with 21 United Kingdom firms for a wide variety of products ranging from those requiring basic engineering skills to those incorporating high technology. The estimated total value of these contracts is just over $14 million. Many of the contracts are for initial quantities with potential follow-on orders. It is not the practice to give details of individual contracts.

Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the number and value of orders secured by United Kingdom contractors for the Trident II missile system and the percentage of total orders coming to the United Kingdom to date.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Member for Kingston Upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). Information on the percentage of total orders coming to the United Kingdom is not available.

50. Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the estimated annual running costs, as opposed to the procurement costs, of the Trident system.

30. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the estimated annual running costs, as opposed to the procurement costs, of the Trident system.

Mr. Heseltine: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on 24 July at column 807.

31. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the latest estimate of the cost of the Trident missile system.

43. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is yet able to announce a revised cost for the Trident programme.

46. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of the Trident programme; and what estimate he now makes of the amount of equipment included in the programme which will be purchased in the United Kingdom.

59. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest available estimated cost of the Trident programme.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

53. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the recent public expenditure review has affected his calculations on the ability to finance the Trident II missile system.

Mr. Heseltine: The Trident programme, in line with all Defence programmes, is under review as part of the annual recosting exercise.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what efforts were made by his Department to procure contracts for United Kingdom firms on the Trident II programme.

Mr. Butler: The agreement enabling United Kingdom firms to compete for sub-contract work formed part of the arrangements for the purchase of the United States Trident II (D5) weapon system programme signed in March 1982.

My Department subsequently established an office in London in order to advise British industry how best to approach the programme. Working closely with the major United Kingdom trade associations, an inaugural briefing was staged in London in May 1982 with United States participation and under the chairmanship of my predecessor. Further industry briefing sessions were made throughout 1982 including at the SBAC Farnborough 1982 Air Show and at local offices of the Department of Industry.

In June 1982, at the Ministry of Defence's request, a "Guide for Potential Sub-contractors" was published by the United States project office advising firms how to seek sub-contracts on the Trident programme, and listing the specific points of contact in the United States. It is estimated that 1,500 United Kingdom firms have been made aware of the programme, the majority by direct briefing.

Negotiations between my Department and the United States Government have successfully removed many of the barriers which frequently deter United Kingdom defence manufacturers from marketing in the United States. Most notable was the United States agreement, exceptionally, to waive the International Traffic in Arms Regulations.

As the participation programme has developed the MOD has maintained a close contact on opportunities open to United Kingdom firms with the United States prime contractors, and has arranged for them to send representatives to the United Kingdom in order to assess United Kingdom firms' capabilities.

The programme entered the full scale engineering development phase in October 1983 and the selection of sub-contractors is expected to be largely complete by the end of 1985. The office set up in London continues to offer advice and assistance to United Kingdom industry and will be closely monitoring the progress of our firms.

NATO (Conventional Weapons)

Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department proposes to meet a North Atlantic Treaty Organisation commitment to increase expenditure on conventional weapons.

Mr. Stanley: By the next financial year the Government will have raised defence expenditure to a level about one fifth higher in real terms that it was in 1978-79. This increase in expenditure has gone overwhelmingly to our conventional forces. We will continue to look for ways of releasing additional resources through greater efficiency, economy and competition.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a copy of his letter of 29 November to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley in the Official Report.

Mr. Heseltine: Yes.

"Dear George,

You wrote to me on 14th November about HMS CONQUEROR'S control room log.

In my answer of 13th November to your written Question, I explained very fully the circumstances in which my Department and I became aware that HMS CONQUEROR'S control room log for this period of the Falklands Campaign was missing. I totally reject your suggestions that indications of the log's disappearance were available earlier or that there was any sinister motive behind an official asking to see the log.

On your second point, although I cannot confirm precisely the information contained in the control room log, since it is not available, I would expect it to contain details of HMS CONQUEROR's movements on 3rd May 1982. Indeed, as both Lord Trefgarne and I explained on 7th November, the log would contain routine readings of latitude and longitude, distance run, course, speed and depth, information which Lord Trefgarne was quite right to maintain would be of no value in the discussions that have been proceeding since the sinking of the Belgrano. As he and I also said, the submarine's operational activities were fully recorded in the Captain's narrative account. I also reject the suggestion that the Government has refused to detail the movements of HMS CONQUEROR on 3rd May: this was covered in the Annex to the Prime Minister's letter to you of 19th September.

On the question of why the control room log was not submitted to Flag Officer Submarines with the Captain's account, I hoped that I had made it clear that, at the conclusion of a patrol, a submarine commander forwards to the appropriate authorities such detailed records as are needed for analysis. These do not normally include the control room log, which is retained on board the submarine until sent to my Department's records office. As Flag Officer Submarines had a detailed daily account of HMS CONQUEROR's operations during the Falklands Campaign, there was no reason for him to ask to see the control room log.

You also asked if I was content with the response of my officials in October to the apparent disappearance of the control room log. I can confirm I am entirely happy that they, and the Commander-in-Chief Fleet, took such action as was necessary to deal with the matter.

Finally, I have nothing to add for the moment to my undertaking to consider making a statement once the report of the Board of Inquiry was available and had been considered by Commander-in-Chief Fleet and the Ministry of Defence. I can assure you that the matter is being dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Michael Heseltine"

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what documents were submitted to the Flag Officer Submarines by the commander of HMS Conqueror on his return to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: I understand that the documents submitted to Flag Officer Submarines by the commanding officer of HMS Conqueror were his report of proceedings including, inter alia, his narrative account.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the collection of documents and information from members of the crew of HMS Conqueror during the two weeks spent in Faslane after its return from the Falklands campaign; and if the procedures used on that occasion represent the normal practice in respect of fleet submarines returning from patrol.

Mr. Stanley: I understand that on her return to Faslane HMS Conqueror landed technical information and data for analysis in the usual way. It is standard practice to ensure that maximum value is derived from each submarine patrol for future operations. I also refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 20 November, at column 84.

16. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence why he has now referred the diary written by a member of the crew of HMS Conqueror during the Falklands war to the Director of Public Prosecutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: As I told the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 30 November, a copy of a diary which apparently was kept by a member of the crew of HMS Conqueror is in the possession of my Department. The diary contains classified information and it appears that its contents have been communicated to persons not authorised to receive such information. This constitutes a prima facie breach of the Official Secrets Acts. In the circumstances of this case my Department considered that it was a matter for reference to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

20. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the crew of HMS Conqueror on 1 July 1982 have now left the Royal Navy.

Mr. Heseltine: Two officers and six ratings.

Airborne Early Warning

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the remaining Shackleton airborne early warning squadrons; and which system he expects to provide radar defence against low level attack in 12 months, 24 months and 36 months from now.

Mr. Stanley: [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 296]: The Shackleton continues to provide a useful AEW capability, but it is an elderly aircraft which is increasingly difficult to maintain. The timing of the disbandment of the Shackleton AEW force in relation to the coming into service of the Nimrod AEW has yet to be decided.

Martin Kettrick

14. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has given any further consideration to the case of Martin Kettrick, the disabled ex-Marine.

Mr. Lee: The case of ex-corporal Kettrick, Royal Marines, is still under consideration. In view of the complexities of the issues involved I cannot yet say when a decision will be made.

Flexible Response and Forward Defence

15. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a definition of flexible response and forward defence.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the essay entitled "NATO Strategy" in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1983".

Multi-launch Rocket System

17. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with the multi-launch rocket system for the Army.

Mr. Butler: We hope shortly to place a firm production order for MLRS phase I launchers and rockets with a European consortium consisting of United Kingdom, French, German and Italian firms. A contract for the development of MLRS phase III was awarded on 29 November by the United States Government on behalf of itself, the United Kingdom, France and Germany to an international consortium consisting of firms from each of those countries.

Hong Kong

18. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total number of British military personnel based in Hong Kong at the latest available date.

Mr. Stanley: At the end of September there were a little over 9,000 British military personnel in Hong Kong.

Military Training (Reorganisation)

19. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the proposed reorganisation of military training.

Mr. Stanley: I am not aware of any on the reorganisation as a whole, but a number of letters have been received on specific local effects of the reorganisation.

Space-based Anti-ballistic Missile Technology

21. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will support the deployment of space-based anti-ballistic missile technology should it prove technically feasible.

35. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will support the deployment of a space-based anti-ballistic missile technology should it prove technically feasible.

Mr. Stanley: The United Kingdom is consulting closely with the United States and other allies on the current research programmes by the United States of America and the Soviet Union into ballistic missile defence systems. Decisions on deployment are some years away.

Type 22 Frigates

22. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is yet in a position to announce the yards that will build the new type 22 frigates.

Mr. Lee: Not yet.

Cruise Missiles

23. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to change the security precautions for exercises involving cruise convoys.

57. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is proposing any changes in the security precautions relating to exercises of cruise convoys.

Mr. Stanley Security precautions always remain under review.

Shoeburyness (Departmental Services)

24. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress there has been in the putting out to tender of the services at his Department's establishment in Shoeburyness.

Mr. Lee: I cannot usefully add to the answer I gave on 15 November at column 344, in which I indicated that tenders would be invited early in the new year.

RAF Molesworth and Alconbury

25. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of RAF Molesworth and RAF Alconbury.

Mr. Stanley: ON RAF Molesworth I cannot at present add to my answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 29 October at column 854.

RAF Alconbury is scheduled to be developed in support of the deployment of TRI tactical reconnaissance aircraft with construction planned to begin next year.

Allied Command Europe

28. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government will consider with other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries the establishment of a separate Allied Command Europe mobile force to defend the European southern flank.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so. NATO plans for the defence of the area involve the deployment of dedicated reinforcements, largely American. The existing Allied Command Europe mobile force also has deployment options on the southern flank.

Trainer Aircraft and Support Helicopters

29. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much weight he intends to attach to (a) the opinions expressed by hon. Members as to the merits of light trainer aircraft and light support helicopters prior to his placing orders on behalf of the Royal Air Force and (b) the opinions expressed by professional aeronautical engineers.

Mr. Butler: Full consideration is always given to the views of hon. Members on such matters and to those of professional aeronautical engineers, including those who work in the Ministry of Defence. Before orders are placed, all relevant factors including performance, price, industrial and sales implications will be analysed fully.

Naval Construction Work

32. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning his ordering plans for naval construction work.

Mr. Lee: In the next year it is planned to order the following ships: two type 22 frigates (22-13 and 14), the first of the Trident class SSBNs, a nuclear-powered fleet submarine SSN19, two mine counter-measure vessels (MCMV 12 and 13), the first of class of the single-role minehunter and the second Upholder class conventional submarine. For the years beyond 1985 there are firm plans to order three more Trident submarines, six of the new one-stop replenishment ship the AOR, and Upholder class submarines at the rate of about one per annum. Further type 23 frigates will be ordered once the build of class, HMS Norfolk, is sufficiently advanced, with the order for 02 expected in about 18 months' time.

Exercise Brave Defender 1985

36. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether county military headquarters will be deployed to their wartime locations with local authorities during Exercise Brave Defender 1985.

Mr. Stanley: No.

RAF (Central Region)

38. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the air defence needs of the Royal Air force in the central region for 1990 and beyond.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 27 November at column 411.

Northern Ireland (Irish Regiments)

39. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the stationing of Irish regiments in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Lee: Irish regiments have not generally been deployed in Northern Ireland for a variety of reasons, not least the additional strain this would place on soldiers and their families. It is not our policy to comment on future deployments.

COCOM

40. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards COCOM and defence sales to China.

Mr. Butler: The Government take a positive attitude towards defence sales to China, wherever this is compatible with our wider political, strategic and security considerations and our COCOM obligations.

ALARM Missile System

42. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the development of export sales potential for the planned ALARM missile system.

Mr. Butler: The Defence Sales Organisation has examined the export sales potential of ALARM and concluded that there should be a significant market for it. We are assisting British Aerospace in its promotion overseas.

European Fighter Aircraft

44. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning progress on the European fighter aircraft.

56. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision on the proposed European fighter aircraft.

63. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the future of the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: The technical and industrial feasibility study of the European fighter aircraft is well under way. The industries of the participating countries which are carrying out the studies are required to complete their work in time for officials to submit a report to the five Defence Ministers for their consideration at a meeting next March. It is hoped that the studies will provide an acceptable basis from which to proceed with a collaborative procurement programme.

Defence Sales (Brazil)

45. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the prospects for increasing defence sales to Brazil.

Mr. Butler: The Brazilian authorities and defence industries are currently interested in a number of United Kingdom defence equipments. If many of these are eventually purchased, we should see an increase in United Kingdom defence exports against levels for recent years.

Nuclear Weapons (Ministerial Control)

47. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes he has made in the arrangements for ministerial control of nuclear weapons as a result of experience gained during the Falklands conflict and its aftermath.

Mr. Heseltine: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to discuss the details of arrangements for ministerial control of nuclear weapons.

Nuclear Missiles

48. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many nuclear missiles he estimates to be targeted in the direction of the United Kingdom by the Soviet Union and its allies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman).

Naval Dockyards

49. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will publish his consultative document on the future of the naval dockyards.

Mr. Lee: It is likely that we will produce a consultative document when we have completed our present deliberations, assuming they result in radical proposals for change.

Flexible Response and Forward Defence

51. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a definition of flexible response and forward defence.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

FH70 Propellant

52. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will explain why the FH70 propellant order has been given to firms in Germany.

Mr. Butler: The agreement between the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Republic of Italy sets out each partner's entitlement to production work within the FH70 programme. The United Kingdom has benefited from an excess of work over its entitlement under that agreement while Germany is in deficit. We are obliged, therefore, to place any new orders in such a way as to aim to restore each partner's work share to the agreed entitlements.

Exercise Lionheart

54. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many foreign flag vessels were chartered for Exercise Lionheart.

Mr. Stanley: Ten foreign flag vessels were chartered for Exercise Lionheart.

Defence Budget

55. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are his proposals for controlling the cost of the defence budget.

Mr. Heseltine: The range of measures in hand to control defence budget costs and to promote the efficient use of defence resources was described in chapter 2 of the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1984" (Cmnd. 9227).

Expenditure

58. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the level of conventional defence spending.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) earlier today.

Falkland Islands (Free Airmail Letters)

60. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the privilege of free airmail letters to servicemen in the Falklands is to be continued.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot on 5 December 1984 at c. 181.

NATO (Weapons Systems)

66. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's attempts to harmonise its weapons systems.

Mr. Butler: There is general recognition within NATO of the need to make faster progress in harmonising weapons systems. In support of this overall NATO effort, European Defence Ministers have recently endorsed initiatives aimed at establishing a more systematic approach to harmonisation. These initiatives include a study of future equipment needs in order to identify areas where common requirements might be drawn up and which might form a basis for collaborative procurement.

Defence Review

67. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will consider undertaking a defence review in the near future.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

NATO Training (Weapons)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to whether, despite the fact that no North Atlanic Treaty Organisation field training exercise this autumn contained a nuclear phase, any weapons capable of being used in a nuclear rôle were moved in connection with, or as a consequence of, any of these exercises.

Mr. Stanley: In the course of NATO exercises, a range of weapons systems may be moved for training purposes, and some of these may be nuclear-capable. Security considerations however preclude my detailing the involvement of particular systems in particular exercises.

South Atlantic

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the Royal Navy current operations budget is now tied to the south Atlantic.

Mr. Stanley: The breakdown of the running costs of the Falklands garrison into its individual components is classified. However, the total running costs of the garrison in 1984-85, excluding capital works and equipment but including the running costs of naval support and of the airbridge, is estimated at some £185 million or just over 1 per cent. of the defence budget.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service men are currently based on the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 12 July 1983 at c. 303.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the Brazilian Government for the provision of landing facilities for the Royal Air Force aircraft servicing the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Stanley: Brazil accepts aircraft diverted there in an emergency, as we would expect any other country to do.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is a condition precedent to consideration by Her Majesty's Government of awarding the basic jet trainer contract to Shorts that the Brazilian Government grants landing facilities for Royal Air Force aircraft servicing the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Butler: No.

Mr. McNamra asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is a condition precedent to consideration by Her Majesty's Government of awarding the basic trainer contract to Shorts that the Brazilian Government grants landing facilities for civil aircraft servicing the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Butler: No.

Lemnos (Militarisation)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement upon the effect which the militarisation of Lemnos by Greece has had upon the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation alliance and Britain's defence relations with Greece and Turkey.

Mr. Stanley: The military status of Lemnos is a matter of dispute between Greece and Turkey. Both NATO and the United Kingdom have taken an even-handed approach and have urged the two countries to resolve their differences bilaterally. But their disagreements have, nevertheless, affected NATO's ability to conduct exercises in the Aegean. Our defence relations with Greece and Turkey remain unaffected.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information on the course and position of the General Belgrano was available to Ministers in his Department between 30 April 1982 and 3 May 1982; and from the information now available to him, if the information available to Northwood on 30 April to 3 May differed from that available to him.

Mr. Stanley: HMS Conqueror reported the course and position of General Belgrano to the Flag Officer Submarines at Northwood on a number of occasions between first sighting General Belgrano on 1 May 1982 and attacking her on 2 May. There is no evidence that these reports, which were not relevant to the threat represented by General Belgrano, were made known to Ministers at the time. On the general question of information in relation to the Belgrano I refer the hon. Members to paragraph 6 of the letter that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wrote to the hon. Member on 19 September.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence at what time Admiral Woodward learned of the visual contact which HMS Conqueror had established with the General Belgrano.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Capital Grants

Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now give details of the changes in farm capital grants promised in his statement of 12 November, Official Report, column 138.

Mr. Jopling: We have today laid statutory instruments before Parliament modifying the agriculture and horticulture grants scheme, the Agriculture and Horticulture Development Scheme (AHDS) and the farm and horticulture development scheme. These will produce the savings of £40 million in 1985-86 announced on 12 November. The changes will come into effect immediately in respect of expenditure under the AHGS incurred after 11 December, and new applications or variations under the AHDS, and variations under the FHDS, received after that date.

The changes, which are detailed in the following schedule, relate almost wholly to the AHGS. In the lowlands, the standard AHGS rate of grant will now be 15 per cent. We shall, however, maintain the enhanced rates for the replacement and improvement of heated glasshouses (37½ per cent.) and for apple and pear orchard replanting (22½ per cent.). For the planting of hedges and the construction of walls using traditional materials we are increasing grant rates to 30 per cent.

In the less-favoured areas, the standard rate of AHGS grant will be 30 per cent. For buildings, electricity or gas supplies and waste disposal systems we are retaining the present rate of 20 per cent. We are reducing grant rates for roads from 40 to 20 per cent. in severely disadvantaged areas and from 20 to 15 per cent. in the marginal areas. The enhanced rates of 60 per cent. introduced last year for hedges, traditional walls and shelter belts in the LFAs are unchanged. We have, however, decided that, in the interests of achieving a better balance between agriculture and conservation, grant should not be available for land clearance. Moreover, land reclamation will now be assisted in Northern Ireland only where it is essential to maintaining farm incomes. Operations such as the removal of tree stumps and other obstacles to cultivation, land levelling or grading and deep ploughing are no longer eligible for grant in Great Britain. These changes apply also for new applications and variations to approved development plans under the FHDS and AHDS. Grant will, however, continue to be available in the less-favoured areas for other land improvement operations such as reseeding and regeneration, the laying down of permanent pasture, bracken control and the regeneration of heather.

For the AHGS alone, the ceiling on the amount of investment which may be grant-aided will be halved, except for the special aid for heated glasshouses and orchard replanting where it remains unchanged. The limit per labour unit will be £25,000 and the overall business limit over six years £50,000. These reductions will apply to expenditure incurred after 11 December 1984.

The only changes under the development schemes (FHDS and AHDS) will be the exclusion of the same land reclamation items now excluded under the AHGS and reductions in the rate of grant for field drainage from 70 to 50 per cent. in the less-favoured areas and from 50 to 32½ per cent. in the lowlands.

In making these changes we are reflecting the Government's declared aim of achieving a closer integration of conservation and agricultural policies through high rates of grant for certain agricultural works of particular benefit to the environment and the exclusion of land clearance and, except in Northern Ireland, reclamation works. We are, however, maintaining the policy of paying enhanced rates of grant in the less-favoured areas in recognition of the natural hardships which they suffer.

When the new capital grants schemes are introduced in 1985 to implement the new EC farm structures policy currently being negotiated in Brussels, we are determined to maintain a level of capital investment support which will enable the industry to preserve its competitive strength. This will take particular account of the needs of the livestock sector, especially in the hills. It is also our intention to introduce further measures to help conservation and to encourage farmers to diversify into non-farming enterprises.

Notes:

(a) Land clearance and reclamation works are no longer eligible for grant in Great Britain under the AHDS and AHGS. In Northern Ireland the reclamation only, including the removal of obstructions to cultivation, is eligible in the less-favoured areas.

(b) The cumulative investment limit for eligible agricultural businesses under the AHGS has been halved from about £100,000 to about £50,000. For eligible horticultural businesses the rates of grant and the investment limits remain at £100,000 where the additional expenditure is on orchard replanting and £130,000 where the extra expenditure is for glasshouse energy conservation.

Milk

Mr. Spence asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many milk producers have so far decided to join the outgoers' scheme; and whether any more will now be invited to join.

Mr. MacGregor: To date, 1,060 producers have committed themselves to joining the scheme. The quota which they will surrender amounts to 109·5 million litres on a full year basis. This week we are sending out invitations to a further 261 producers who each have between 275,000 and 325,000 litres of quota, amounting to 78·1 million litres in total. As before, a small number have been excluded because milk production is a relatively small part of their overall farming enterprise.

Progress will be reviewed early in January and from then onwards further groups of producers will be invited to join the scheme each week in so far as this is necessary to offset the number not taking up earlier invitations. This process will continue until our target of 289 million litres is reached.

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current position regarding quotas over off-farm sales of retail milk or other dairy products such as butter, cheese or yoghurt by farmers; whether the quotas are to be made interchangeable with general quotas of milk sold to the Milk Marketing Board; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Producers who make direct sales of whole, skimmed or semi-skimmed milk, butter, cream or cheese had to apply for direct sales quota by 28 August 1984. Yogurt is not covered by the milk quota arrangements.

Estimates of primary direct sales quota have now been issued to over 90 per cent. of the 3,454 applicants. It is hoped that the remainder will receive their notifications shortly.

Under the terms of the Community regulations quota arrangements for direct sales are dealt with quite separately from those for wholesale deliveries to a purchaser. I consider that the regulations are rather too rigid in this respect and we are continuing to press in Brussels for greater flexibility. In the meantime, we intend to make use of the existing provisions which provide some limited measure of flexibility between the two types of quota. If a producer has more wholesale quota than he needs but not enough direct sales quota (or vice versa) he will be able to apply to the MMB to exchange some of his quota with a producer in the opposite position. The quota exchange system will be operated on the Ministry's behalf by the MMB.

The detailed arrangements are being finalised in discussions with the interests concerned and I hope to make an announcement shortly.

Beef and Lamb

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what change has taken place in consumer demand for beef and lamb, respectively, since 1979;

(2) what has been the percentage change in the retail price of beef and lamb, respectively, since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cereals

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the total imports of cereals to (a) the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and (b) China from (i) the EEC, (ii) the USA, (iii) Canada, (iv) Argentina and (v) Australia, for each of the years 1960, 1970, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Channon: Details of imports by the USSR and China by trading partner are not available. The available partner country export data are in the table.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what were the total proceeds to the EEC of the 2,156,658 tonnes of cereal exports to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1982 and the average price per tonne of cereals sold to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1982 and 1983;

(2) what were the total proceeds to the EEC of the 706,415 tonnes of cereal exports to China in 1982 and the average price per tonne of cereals sold to China in 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Channon: In 1982 European Community exports of cereals to the USSR and China were valued at $360·8 million and $104·2 million respectively. Price details are in the table.

Textiles

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest position regarding funds available from the European regional development fund non-quota textile measures allocations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) on 27 November 1984, at columns 434-36.

British Telecom

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants have been received by British Telecom from the European regional development fund in each parliamentary constituency in the Lancashire, East Euro constituency since 1979.

Mr. Butcher: ERDF grants have been approved in respect of the following British Telecom projects in the Lancashire, East Euro constituency since 1979:

1. £98,100 in respect of a Rossendale region modernisation project in 1983.
2. £18,000 in respect of a Rossendale industrial development area project in 1984.

Both projects were located in the Rossendale and Darwen constituency.

Companies (Public Funds)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies which have been in receipt of public funds over the past 10 years have eventually gone into liquidation.

Mr. Fletcher: I regret that this information is not available.

Regional Aid (North-West)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effects he expects Her Majesty's Government's new policy on regional aid to have on unemployment in the north-west.

Mr. Trippier: The new policy is aimed at reducing regional imbalances in employment opportunities. The scale of the effect depends on industry's response to the incentives. It is not possible to forecast the impact on unemployment in particular areas.

French Cosmetic Product

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the French cosmetic product, the name of which has been supplied to him, has been licensed for sale in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fletcher: Cosmetics do not have to be licensed for sale in the United Kingdom, but they have to comply with the Cosmetic Products Regulations 1984. I have no knowledge of the product in question, but if the hon. Member would supply me with a sample, together with the reason why he is concerned about it, I will have it analysed.

Cargo Centre Development, Manchester

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he gave to the implications for the viability of the cargo centre development at Manchester international airport in allowing new freight agencies to qualify for grant-aid within areas of Manchester but specifically excluding the airport.

Mr. Trippier: Agents facilitating freight transport will qualify under the new RDG scheme, which applies only to development areas. Decisions on qualifying activities were taken according to the likely effect on employment opportunities in the development areas as a whole; decisions on map coverage were based on areas' relative needs for employment opportunities. The Manchester TTWA is part non-assisted and part intermediate area, with the latter abutting other TTWAs which are also assisted. We included as much of the Manchester TTWA as was possible within a total map coverage of 35 per cent. of GB working population without excluding areas with a greater need.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has seen copies of the telex exchanges between the Caribbean countries involved and the European Commissioner regarding the purchase of Super 748 aircraft for Leeward Islands Air Transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions the Minister for Trade had with Commonwealth Caribbean leaders when he attended the Caribbean Basin meeting in Miami, on the purchase of new turboprop aircraft for Leeward Islands Air Transport and the possibility of United Kingdom funding, in view of the European Community aid offer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 345]: The matter was not raised with me by any of the Governments concerned. It is my understanding that Leeward Islands Air Transport and the Caribbean Development Bank are still in contact with the European Commission, but I am keeping the matter under close review.

West Midlands

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report which areas of the west midlands have been (a) downgraded and (b) upgraded as a result of his recent changes in regional aid.

Mr. Trippier: The information is as follows:

(a) No areas in the west midlands were downgraded.

(b) The following travel-to-work areas in the west midlands were designated intermediate areas: Birmingham, Cinderford and Ross-on-Wye (partly in South-West region), Coventry and Hinckley (partly East Midlands region), Dudley and Sandwell, Kidderminster, Telford and Bridgnorth, Walsall, Wolverhampton.

ENVIRONMENT

Falkland Islands (Vic Hallam Company)

69. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the work done by the Vic Hallam Company on building houses for his Department in the Falkland Islands.

Sir George Young: The Vic Hallam Company is currently providing prefabricated living accommodation for the new RAF camp at Mount Pleasant. The company is sub-contractor to the main contractor, the Laing-Mowlem-Amey Roadstone Construction joint venture. Responsibility for the satisfactory completion of this accommodation rests with the main contractor and I am satisfied that it can meet the specifications laid down in its contract.

Common Land

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the protection of common land in England.

Mr. Waldegrave: I recognise that there is some concern about the effects of deregistration of common land.

This and other matters relating to commons are currently being considered by the Common Land Forum, which was set up last January under the aegis of the Countryside Commission. We shall give careful consideration to any proposals, resulting from the forum's deliberations, concerning future protection of common land.

Town Planners (Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many qualified town planners were employed in the Manchester regional office of his Department on 31 July; how many were employed there on 1 November; and how many he estimates will be employed there by 1 April.

Mr. Macfarlane: Eight plus one part-time on each of the first two dates. One of this number will have retired by 1 April 1985. Arrangements are in hand to appoint a suitable replacement.

Bed-and-breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to take any action to enable London boroughs to reduce the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation; and whether he intends to propose legislation which will ensure that conditions in these hotels are satisfactory and safe.

Sir George Young: It is for individual authorities to decide on their own housing priorities within the resources available to them. The Government will continue to encourage them to concentrate resources on capital provision for those in greatest housing need, including the homeless, and to minimise the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation. We have encouraged also the use of empty property and I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on 22 November, at column 284.

Authorities have ample powers to ensure satisfactory conditions amenities and safety in houses in multiple occupation. The need for further measures will be considered in the light of the outcome of the Department's current research into the use and condition of such accommodation.

Trafford Park Enterprise Zone

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of private sector jobs created as a result of the Trafford park enterprise zone since its creation; and if he will give the average cost of each new job created.

Sir George Young: From 12 August 1981 (the date of designation of the zone) to 31 May 1983, the consultants who surveyed the zones on behalf of the Department found that 54 firms and 730 jobs had been established in the Trafford park enterprise zone. By 31 December 1983 the consultants estimated that a further 152 jobs had been added. No distinction was made between jobs in the private sector and other sectors. As to the cost per job, I refer to my answer to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) on 6 December, at column 238.

Water Authorities

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the financial targets for 1985-86 of each water authority in England.

Mr. Macfarlane: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction is still discussing with the water authorities the individual financial targets to be set for 1985-86 within the announced policy of achieving an average rate of return of 1·4 per cent.

Hulme (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the recent visit by the Minister for Housing and Construction to the Hulme area of Manchester; and what action he now proposes to take following this visit.

Mr. Gow: The future of the Hulme estate is initially a matter for Manchester city council. The city council has made proposals for the estate in its housing investment programme submission for 1985-86, and these will be considered carefully before the housing capital allocation is decided.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the section 137 entitlement and expenditure for 1982-83 for each local authority in England.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have today placed copies of the information requested in the Libraries.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of jobs filled in each enterprise zone; and whether any further enterprise zones are being planned.

Sir George Young: The consultant who monitored progress in the first 11 zones reported the following, on the basis of surveys carried out between the date of designation of the zones and 31 May 1983 (the figures in brackets show their estimate of the number of jobs added in the period 31 May—31 December 1983):

Enterprise Zone	Net increase in jobs up to 31 May 1983
Belfast	332	(169)
Clydebank	1,637	(544)
Corby	1,591	(494)
Dudley	523	(118)
Hartlepool	476	(137)
Isle of Dogs	353	(451)
Salford/Trafford	1,052	(462)
Speke	453	(134)
Swansea	1,046	(172)
Tyneside	446	(187)
Wakefield	156	(17)
Totals	8,065	(2,885)

We are currently collecting data about progress in these 11 zones since 31 May 1983 and on the 14 zones designated after that date.

We have no plans at present to create further enterprise zones.

Humberside County Council

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much is in the balances, capital receipts fund, repairs and renewals fund and any other similar fund of Humberside county council; from whence those resources come; and how much has come from underspends on budgets in previous years, giving each years figures since 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the information supplied by Humberside county council on annual outturn returns:

	Balances at end of year: £ million
	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Rate fund revenue accounts	18·1	10·5	..	2·4
Capital accounts	0·7	—	0·1	−1·1
Special and Capital Funds	1·0	3·7	21·2	17·9

A full explanation of the source of these balances can be obtained only from the authority concerned.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the total budget of Humberside county council was for 1983-84 and 1984-85, respectively; by how much the county council has underspent in each year; if he will give the figures for underspend in each underspending department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the readily available information for Humberside county council, based on "total" expenditure for block grant purposes (expenditure to be raised from block grant, rates and rate fund balances).

	Budget £ Million	Outturn £ million
1983-84	317·7	316·6
1984-85	318·7	not available

Lordlords (Compensation)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he has decided to increase with effect from 25 December the compensation payable to landlords whose property is the subject of a control order by their local council.

Sir George Young: Section 78 of the Housing Act 1964, as amended, imposes a duty on local authorities to pay compensation, fixed by reference to rateable values, to landlords who are dispossessed by a control order. The last rating revaluation took place in 1973. The level of compensation was adjusted in 1981 by Statutory Instrument 1981/781. S.I. 1984/1629 takes account of the change in values since then.

Multiple Occupation Houses (Safety Precautions)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on means of escape from fire in houses of multiple occupation.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce legislation to strengthen fire and other safety provisions for houses in multiple occupation.

Mr. Gow: The Government have considered carefully the representations for, and the implications of, an extension to the scope of the Housing (Means of Escape from Fire in Houses in Multiple Occupation) Order (SI 1981/1576). The Government have decided that it would not be appropriate to increase the statutory duties of local authorities at the present time. Local authorities already have powers to require adequate means of escape from fire in houses in multiple occupation and my right hon. Friend looks to them to exercise that power in the light of their knowledge of their area and the resources available to them.

Homeless People

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what allowance he intends to make in allocating capital for housing in 1985-86 for the number of homeless people in Greater London;

(2) what assistance he has offered to councils in Greater London to reduce the number of homeless persons;

(3) what assistance he has offered to councils in Greater London to help reduce their dependence on bed and breakfast accommodation for homeless people.

Sir George Young: My Department makes substantial capital allocations to London and other authorities. In making the allocations, regard is paid to the homelessness indicator in the generalised needs index and to information about homelessness provided by authorities. Allocations may be used at authorities' discretion for new building, bringing empty property into use and certain other measures which would reduce dependence on bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

London (Housing)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of housing starts by the Greater London council and each London borough in 1978-79 and each subsequent year; and what is the estimate for the current year.

Sir George Young: Figures of dwellings started for these housing authorities in each calendar year, appear in "Local Housing Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. The relevant issues are listed below:

	Number
1978	49
1979	59
1980	57, 59-62
1981	65
1982	66
1983	70
1984*	71

* First half of 1984.

The Department has made no estimates of house building starts for the year 1984.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he has made to inform the London boroughs and metropolitan district councils about the proposed financial arrangements to follow the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department has recently written to the chief executives of all London boroughs and metropolitan district councils about the proposals. Copies of these letters have been placed in the Library.

Acid Rain

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what funds his Department is spending on research into acid deposition in the current financial year; how much is expected to be spent next year; if he will list the projects involved, where known; and how much of this represents moneys allocated to basic research and applied research, respectively.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend expects to spend approximately £1·5 million on acid deposition research and monitoring in the current financial year; the projects involved are listed below.

An increase of about £1 million in this total is being planned for 1985-86 to be spent largely on additional monitoring and on research into the effects of acid deposition.

Most of the Department's research is aimed at solving pollution problems and should therefore be classified as applied, although some basic supporting research is also necessary.

Project and Contractor

Warren Spring Laboratory

1. Monitoring, atmospheric measurement and modelling of acid components and precursors.

AERE, Harwell

2. Atmospheric chemistry, modelling of photo-oxidants and acid components.

NERC, Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, Edinburgh

3. Effects of acid deposition on plants and soils.

Macaulay Institute for Soil Research

4. Effects of acid deposition on upland soils and streams.

DAFS, Freshwater Fisheries Laboratory

5. Effects of acidification on the fauna of lakes and streams in Scotland.

University of Loughborough

6. Chemical inputs from precipitation and their effects on the chemistry of a catchment area.

Imperial College

7. Combined impact of acid deposition and ozone.

Welsh Water Authority/NERC

8. Effect of different land management regimes on water acidity, fish stocks and freshwater biota in 5 catchment areas in Wales.

AERE, Harwell

9. Modelling of acid deposition and photo-oxidants.

Imperial College

10. Effects of acid deposition and ozone on trees.

North West Water Authority/NERC

11. Effects of acidification on freshwater biota in the Rivers Esk and Duddon, Cumbria.

NERC/AERE

12. Effects of acid mists and fogs at altitude, Great Dun Fell, Cumbria.

National Physical Laboratory/BRE

13. Controlled exposure studies of economic materials.

Freshwater Bodies (Acidification)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the freshwater bodies in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) Wales which have become acidified (i) to the point where fish populations have been killed off and (ii) to the point where fish populations and other aquatic life are in serious danger.

Mr. Waldegrave: Precise information is not available to enable the details requested by the right hon. Gentleman to be provided. My Department has therefore recently established a group of experts to review the availability and quality of information on (i) the extent and degree of acidity in surface waters in the United Kingdom and (ii) the status of freshwater fisheries; to review the geological and hydrological factors in a catchment area; to advise on the need for additional data; and to assess the implications of the foregoing for freshwater fisheries and aquatic ecosystems. The group is expected to report in the next 18 months to two years.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has to show that emissions of sulphur dioxide or nitrous oxides from fossil fuel-fired power stations are affecting the acidity of freshwater bodies in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) Wales.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is strong circumstantial evidence to suggest that acidification of freshwater bodies in some areas is, in part, associated with emissions either now or in the past of sulphur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen from combustion processes including power stations. It is not possible to relate specific damage to specific emission sources in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

The extent of acidification of freshwaters in Scotland, England and Wales and the causes of acidification are being assessed by an expert group set up by my Department.

Vegetation (Ozone Damage)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is aware of any damage to vegetation in the United Kingdom by ozone in recent years; and what research is in progress on this topic.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. Research over the last 10 years has shown that summer time ambient ozone levels in rural southern England can cause visible foliar injury and reductions in growth of some crop species. My Department is currently funding research on the effects of ozone on trees and crops through Imperial College (who also receive funds from the Natural Environment Research Council and the Commission of the European Communities for this purpose). I understand that the CEGB also funds work in this area.

Air Pollution (Crops and Trees)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum his Department is planning to spend in the next financial year on air pollution damage to crops and trees in the United Kingdom; and how the sum compares with the amount spent in the current financial year.

Mr. Waldegrave: Expenditure by the Department on research into the effects of air pollution on crops and trees in the United Kingdom is expected to exceed £300,000 in 1985-86. About £250,000 will be spent in the current financial year.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the fall in total sulphur dioxide emissions from United Kingdom sources (a) between 1970 and 1980 and (b) from 1980 to date, has been because of reductions in emissions from Central Electricity Board power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

Acid Deposition (Power Stations)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the contribution from emissions from fossil fuel-fired power stations in the United Kingdom to the total acid deposition in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

68. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what effect the new eligibility criteria for entrants to community programme schemes which have been introduced are expected to have on the level of participation by married women in the scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number who will be affected by the decision to give priority to those people who meet the programme's criteria for long-term unemployment and are also benefit recipients will vary according to changing personal and family circumstances. Married women may claim benefit in their own right and we have provided that where benefit is claimed by a head of household and includes an element of payment for an unemployed spouse, that spouse will also be regarded as a benefit recipient.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Paddy Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the Manpower Services Commission defines special training needs in the context of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Youngsters with special training needs are not separately categorised. An offer of a suitable place on the youth training scheme is guaranteed to all eligible minimum age school leavers regardless of their individual ability. Where necessary, special provision is made for disabled youngsters, many of whom will have special training needs.

Unemployment

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement of the likely future trends on long-term unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department does not make forecasts of trends in unemployment. However changes in long-term unemployment tend to lag behind changes in total unemployment and it is therefore likely that long-term unemployment may continue to increase for some time after total unemployment stabilises.

Engineering Apprenticeships

Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he had made of assistance given to the engineering industry training board by the Greater Manchester council of additional funding to provide engineering apprenticeships during the last two years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that the engineering industry training board's involvement is limited to the provision of information about trainees to Greater Manchester council, and that the board receives no direct assistance. My Department has made no assessment of this co-operation, which is a matter between the council and the board.

Adult Training

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many adult training places are available for each 100,000 of the work force, by region, in 1984-85; and how many he expects to be available in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: For each 100,000 of the work force I estimate that the following numbers of people will benefit from our locally run adult training programmes:

	1984-85	1985-86 Provisional
Scotland	402	763
Northern	564	848
North West	420	755
Yorkshire and Humberside	326	652
Midlands	269	702
Wales	393	628
South West	294	677
South East	241	522
London	347	501

Skillcentres

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the expansion of the mobile instructor service announced as part of the proposals for the future of the skillcentre training agency.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The proposed expansion of the skillcentre training agency's mobile instructor force to around 300 staff would enable the agency to deliver training wherever and whenever employers needed it. The mobile force would concentrate on new technology skills which are vital to the country's future economic well-being. To keep the force up-to-date it is proposed that 100 of the staff should be recruited on short-term contracts.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give an assurance that, whenever possible, the instructional staff who will be affected by the proposed skillcentre closures will be retained so that their skills can be retained by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison: If its proposals are agreed, the skillcentre training agency intends that 200 of the 300 instructors required for the greatly expanded mobile instructor force would come from among its existing instructors. The agency also intends that whenever possible it will retain instructors through retraining and re-deployment.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment what will be the effect of proposals for the future of the skillcentre training agency on its new technology training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In 1985-86 the skillcentre training agency proposes to deliver 12 per cent. more new technology training in specialist classes—including that carried out in its new technology access centres—than this year. It would expect this upward trend to continue in 1986-87, both in skillcentres and through the expanded mobile instructor force, and is also increasingly incorporating new technology elements in other courses.

National Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his current policy in respect of the national dock labour scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the statements made in July that the Government have no plans to change or abolish the national dock labour scheme.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he next proposes to meet representatives of the Transport and General Workers Union to discuss the implications for the national dock labour scheme of the proposed Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to discuss with the Transport and General Workers Union any views it may have on this matter, and no invitation to do so has been received from it.

Theatre Technicians

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about unemployment levels amongst theatre technicians.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available.

Noise Protection

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the current protection of workers from noise; and if he will make a statement on the EEC directive on the wearing of hearing protection.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am satisfied that the Health and Safety Executive is taking effective action to secure the protection of workers from noise as described in the reply given by my predecessor to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 24 January 1984 at column 488.

The proposed EC directive, on the protection of workers from noise, is not concerned only with hearing protection, but the provision and wearing of hearing protection in work places where it is not reasonably practicable to limit exposure to an acceptable level by other means is an essential feature of it, as it would be of any domestic legislation on this subject. Negotiations on the proposed directive have been making progress, and are to be reviewed by the Social Affairs Council at its meeting on 13 December.

Construction Workers

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will indicate the number of unemployed construction workers in Great Britain.

Mr. Alan Clark: The 1983 labour force survey indicates that in the second quarter of 1983 some 250,000 persons whose previous job had been in the construction industry were without a paid job and seeking work.

Unemployment (London)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present level and percentage rate of unemployment in London; and what are the comparable figures for blacks.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 360]: The latest available information comes from the 1983 labour force survey which provides the following provisional estimates for the Greater London area, for the second quarter of 1983.

	Out of employment (Thousand)	Out of employment as a proportion of economically active (per cent.)
All ethnic origins	300	9
Non-white ethnic origin	75	15

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outstanding problems of verification with regard to recent resolutions at the United Nations calling for a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Luce: We believe that for a test ban to command general acceptance it must contain adequate safeguards against the danger of non-compliance by any of its signatory parties. This position was reflected in our voting on recent resolutions at the United Nations. As a first step towards ensuring that compliance with a comprehensive test ban is adequately verifiable, current techniques of seismic verification, on which monitoring of such a treaty would depend, require significant improvement. We have played an active part, including the tabling in 1983 of an important working paper, in discussions of verification aspects of the CTB at the Geneva conference on disarmament. We shall continue to do so.

Lemnos (Militarisation)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement upon the militarisation of the island of Lemnos by Greece, and the effect that that will have upon Anglo-Greek and Anglo-Turkish relations.

Mr. Renton: The question of the militarisation of the island of Lemnos has been a matter of long-standing dispute between Greece and Turkey. Britain is an ally of both countries. We hope that they will soon be able to resolve this and other disputes relating to the Aegean.

Treaty of Lausanne

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the excercise by the United Kingdom of its obligations under the treaty of Lausanne as it affects the Aegean.

Mr. Renton: The treaty of peace with Turkey signed at Lausanne in 1923 is wide-ranging and covers many issues of relevance to the Aegean. We have no reason to believe that we are not adequately discharging any obligation which the treaty may still impose upon us.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Students (Statistics)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of (a) male and (b) female undergraduate students following degree courses in England and Wales, the number who receive a mandatory grant award and the number who receive dependants' additions to their basic grant award; and, of these numbers, how many students' dependants' awards are made in relation to dependent children.

Mr. Brooke: In 1982-83 there were 192,000 male and 150,000 female full-time and sandwich home students following first degree courses in England and Wales. In the same year 370,500 students received a full value mandatory award from English and Welsh local education authorities. Information on mandatory awards by sex of student is not available. There is no direct link between award holders and numbers studying in England and Wales. This is because award holders from English and Welsh authorities could choose to study anywhere in the United Kingdom and vice versa.

In 1982-83, 9,600 students received an additional dependants' allowance. Numbers of students' dependants' awards made in relation to dependent children are not available.

Blind and Deaf Children (Teaching)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to have completed his analysis of responses to the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers report on the training of teachers and of hearing-impaired children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales are considering the responses to the ACSET report and will announce their decisions in due course.

Thompson Report

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to issue his circular to local authorities on the implementation of the Thompson report.

Mr. Brooke: Early in the new year.

Special Education Needs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children under the age of five years have been the subject of a statement of special education needs under section 4 of the Education Act 1981 in each local authority.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

AIDS (Research)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has concerning expenditure upon and allocation of personnel to research into acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 26 November, at column 389, to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). The Medical Research Council's research referred to in that reply is being carried out at three centres in London and one in Manchester. I understand that a total of eight scientists are receiving grant support, which also provides the salaries for eight support staff as well as laboratory expenses and equipment.

It is possible that research work relevant to AIDS is also being conducted in universities and medical schools, financed from the block grant to universities allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee.

Teachers (Pay)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current average levels of pay of secondary school headmasters, deputy headmasters and teaching staff; and how they compare with those of 1979 and with those of each year since 1979.

Mr. Dunn: Information by the grades requested is not readily available. I shall write to the hon. Member about this as soon as possible. The average salaries of all full-time teachers in maintained secondary schools in England and Wales were as follows:

31 March	£
1979	5,181
1980	6,217
1981	7,783
1982	8,454
*1983	9,048

* Provisional.

Since 31 March 1983, the latest date for which complete figures are available, salary rates have been increased by 4·98 per cent. (from 1 April 1983) and 5·1 per cent. (from 1 April 1984) and the application of those increases to the 1983 provisional figure above produces a current estimated average salary for full-time secondary school teachers of £9,983.

Students (Tuition Fees)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what increases have taken place in the level of costs incurred for tuition fees for British students at universities and polytechnics; and to what extent such fees have risen annually since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The recommended fee levels for advanced courses for students charged the home rate of fee since 1979-80 have been as follows:

	Under-graduate £	Post-graduate £
1979-80	595	890
1980-81	740	1,105
1981-82	900	1,320
1982-83	480	1,413
1983-84	480	1,494
1984-85	500	1,569
1985-86	520	1,632

British students may be charged higher fees if they do not have the relevant connection with the United Kingdom specified in the Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1983 and are not excepted students under the provisions of these regulations.

Overseas Students

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the amount which students from overseas have had to pay towards university tuition fees for the current academic year; and how this amount compares with those paid in the academic year 1978-79 and with those paid in every academic year since 1978-79.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's policy is that overseas students who began their courses after 1 September 1980 should pay fees that cover the cost of their education in the United Kingdom. The level of fee is now for universities to decide in accordance with that policy and in the light of their own circumstances. Universities have in general charged the minimum fee that has been proposed by the Government or, since 1983, recommended by the University Grants Committee. The minima that have applied from time to time are as follows.

	Undergraduate £	Postgraduate £
1978-79	705	925
1979-80	770	1,010

	Arts Courses	Science Courses	Clinical Years of Medicine, Dentistry and Venterinary Science £
1980-81	2,000	3,000	5,000
1981-82	2,500	3,600	6,000
1982-83	2,700	3,600	6,600
1983-84	2,900	3,800	7,000
1984-85	3,150	4,150	7,650

World Scientific Research (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take on the report from the science policy research unit at Sussex university, a copy of which has been sent to him, on the decline of the United Kingdom's share of world scientific research.

Mr. Brooke: The Advisory Board for the Research Councils advises my right hon. Friend on his responsibilities for civil science. It is thus for the ABRC in the first instance to assess the significance of this particular report and to advise accordingly. The recent announcement of extra money for the science budget confirms that the Government attach the greatest importance to maintaining the health and vigour of British science.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia (Famine Relief)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Ethiopian Government concerning the distribution of Her Majesty's Government's famine relief to the Eritrean population.

Mr. Raison: When I saw the Relief and Rehabilitation Commissioner in London on 7 November, and during my visit to Ethiopia between 25 and 27 November, I urged the Ethiopian Government to co-operate fully in ensuring that relief gets through to those in need in all drought-affected areas irrespective of their background or political affiliations.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on the British contribution to famine relief in Ethiopia, in the light of the details sent to him by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside.

Mr. Raison: The Government share the concern of others that relief supplies should reach those in need in all drought-affected areas. For this reason, we continue to channel the bulk of our assistance through British and international organisations already working in those areas.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Economic Growth

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of economic growth he expects for 1985.

Mr. Peter Rees: Gross domestic product is expected to grow by 3·5 per cent. in 1985.

Scotland (Incomes)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average real income of (a) the top 10 per cent., (b) the top 20 per cent. and (c) the botton 20 per cent. of taxpayers in Scotland in 1979-80 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Moore: Estimates of average income for different percentiles of taxpayers resident in Scotland are readily available only from 1980-81. For average total income before tax in 1980-81 and 1981-82 (the latest available), they are as follows:

Average total income before tax (£)

*Percentage of taxpayers	£ 1980-81	£ 1981-82	Percentage increase†
Top 10 per cent.	15,200	17,100	12·0
Top 20 per cent.	12,400	13,900	11·8
Bottom 20 per cent.	2,550	2,790	9·4

* Married couples paying tax are counted as one unit
† Calculated from unrounded figures
[Source: Annual Survey of Personal Incomes]

The percentage increase in the general index of retail prices between 1980-81 and 1981-82 was 11·5 per cent.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage share of total income after tax of (a) the top 10 per cent. and (b) the top 20 per cent. of taxpayers in Scotland in 1979-80; and what where the corresponding figures for the latest available date.

Mr. Moore: Estimates for taxpayers resident in Scotland are readily available only from 1980-81. Estimates for 1980-81 and for 1981-82 (the latest available) are as follows:

Percentage share of Total Income after tax

*Percentage of taxpayers	1980-81	1981-82
Top 10 per cent.	22·1	22·4
Top 20 per cent.	36·9	37·5

* Married couples paying tax are counted as one unit
[Source: Annual Survey of Personal Incomes]

North Sea Oil

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue has been received through taxation from North sea oil between (a) 1974 and 1979 and (b) 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Moore: Total tax take from the North Sea—that is royalties, petroleum revenue tax (including advance payments), supplementary petroleum duty and ring fence corporation tax (before ACT set-off)—was £930 million in the period between January 1974 and April 1979. From May 1979 to October 1984, the total tax take was £35·1 billion.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government's position on the question of the imposition of value added tax on non-domestic construction work remains unaltered since 29 February.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. The EC Commission has now issued a reasoned opinion under article 169 of the Treaty of Rome alleging that certain aspects of the VAT zero rates in force in the United Kingdom including those applicable to non-domestic construction are contrary to the provisions of the sixth VAT directive. The United Kingdom Government have made it clear that they do not accept the Commission's views.

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the operation of the Value Added Tax (General) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984 as it relates to the Post Office's Datapost service and the services operated by international air courier companies.

Mr. Hayhoe: Two trade associations representing international air couriers and freight forwarders have written to or had meetings with Customs and Excise seeking parity of treatment with the Post Office's Datapost service.

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that both plain water, as supplied in hospitals for new-born babies, and dextrose solutions, as supplied for the same purposes, are both zero-rated for value added tax purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. Purified bottled water and dextrose solutions are both taxable at the standard rate. Supplies to patients in hospitals are exempt from the tax. With certain limited exceptions, the VAT charged on supplies of goods and services to the Health Service cannot be reclaimed. But the allocation of funds to the Health Service takes the incidence of VAT fully into account.

Foetal Material

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what checks are applied by Customs and Excise officers at British ports on the export of dead foetal material; whether there is a specific customs classification for such material; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: As there is no legislation prohibiting or restricting the exportation of human foetal material Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have no authority to impose controls and do not do so. There is no specific customs classification for such material.

Gay's the Word Bookshop

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which of the books detained from the Gay's the Word bookshop are listed as obtainable in the United Kingdom in British Books in Print.

Mr. Hayhoe: As it will take a little time to obtain this information I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what compensation Her Majesty's Customs and Excise will make to the Gay's the Word bookshop for the deterioration in condition and consequently in value of the books detained and subsequently returned.

Mr. Hayhoe: Customs and Excise have not received any claim for compensation from Gay's the Word bookshop.

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 4 December, Official Report, column 177, if he will list the last six cases under each of the Acts referred to which were included in the instructions given to the 36 officers reading the books taken from the Gay's the Word bookshop.

Mr. Hayhoe: The instructions given to the officers did not refer to specific cases under any of the Acts quoted.

Income Tax

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the amounts at 1984-85 prices that could be raised by 1p on the standard rate of income tax in England for the financial years 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 23 November 1984, c. 295]: For the United Kingdom, the estimated yields from increases of 1p in the basic rate of tax are as follows:

	*£ million at 1984-85 prices
1978-79†	705
1979-80†	755
1980-81	1,015

† assuming that the lower rate of tax remained at 25 per cent.

I regret that estimates relating only to England are not available.

Mr. Ewing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of the last 10 years the number of people who paid tax at (a) the standard rate and (b) each of the successive higher rate bands.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, column 378]: This information is as follows. The figures relate to tax units, that is count married couples as one. Estimates for 1982-83 onwards are provisional. Due to rounding, the individual figures in the table do not in all cases sum to the total.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the saving if (a) all tax reliefs and (b) personal tax allowances were set against the standard rate of tax only.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 November 1984, c. 579]: The cost at 1984-85 levels of income of allowing personal tax allowances at rates in excess of the basic rates of income tax is estimated at about £380 million. Information on the similar cost of other income tax reliefs is available only in respect of mortgage interest, retirement annuity premiums and employees' superannuation contributions; in total it is about £400 million. It is not possible to estimate precisely the combined yield from restricting these reliefs and personal allowances to the basic rate, but it is thought to be about £900 million.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why tax rebates for the financial year 1983-84 are being withheld from striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 372]: If a worker is absent from work because he is participating or directly interested in a trade dispute at his place of employment, his employer is required, by the Income Tax (Employment) Regulations 1973 (as amended), to withhold any PAYE refund due to him until he returns to work.

Commercial Bills

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the Bank of England's stock of commercial bills since the reply of 21 July 1983, Official Report, column 178; and whether short-term monetary interest rates are now above or below the level appropriate to the Government's monetary policy.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 372]: Figures for Issue Department transactions in commercial bills are published in "Financial Statistics", table 11.5. Quarterly changes in Bank of England holdings of bills are published in a table in the article on the operation of monetary policy which appears in each issue of the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin.

The bank's operations have prevented money market shortages from driving up short-term interest rates to an inappropriate level.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Erne Catchment Area

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the development of the Erne catchment area.

Dr. Boyson: Since the publication of the Erne catchment study report in June 1980 the Government have assisted with the improvement of tourist amenities and accommodation in that part of the area falling within Northern Ireland; further development will continue to take account of the recommendations of the report.

Fair Employment Agency

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the members of the Fair Employment Agency for Northern Ireland and indicate how long they have each held membership.

Dr. Boyson: Set out below are the names of members of the Fair Employment Agency together with the commencement dates of their membership of the agency.

Name	Date membership commenced
Mr. Robert G. Cooper	September 1976
Mr. Howard Burns	May 1981
Mrs. Mary Byrne	July 1982
Mr. Ross Campbell, OBE	October 1983
Mr. Thomas E. Conaty	September 1976
Mr. J. Paul M. Donaghaty	November 1984
Mr. Tom D. Douglas	December 1982
Mr. James J. Eccles	September 1984
Mr. Robert T. Jordan, MBE	October 1982

Mr. Kevin Murphy	September 1984

Custodial Remand (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for each year since 1980, how many prisoners were remanded in custody prior to trial for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Year	Offence type
	Scheduled	Non-scheduled
1980	828	854
1981	1,373	1,092
1982	1,199	1,122
1983	1,154	1,009

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for each year since 1980, what was the average length of time that prisoners spent on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows.

Average waiting time (number of weeks from first remand to termination of trial)

	1980	1981	1982	1983
All persons	36	38	35	37
Persons charged with scheduled offences	43	44	39	46
Persons charged with non-scheduled offences	26	29	22	20

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners in 1982 and 1983 were remanded in custody prior to trial for periods between (a) 0 to 3 months, (b) 3 to 6 months, (c) 6 to 9 months, (d) 9 to 12 months, (e) 12 to 18 months and (f) over 18 months for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available exactly in the form requested but the following information is available:—

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, for each year since 1980, what percentage of prisoners on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively were (a) given a non-custodial sentence, (b) given a custodial sentence and (c) found not guilty or not proceeded against.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the exact form requested. However, the following details are available:

Disposal	1980 percentage		1981 percentage		1982 percentage		1983 percentage

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Staff)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many combinations of grade and area of work there were in the National Health Service in 1983; and how these combinations were distributed between dental and medical staff, nursing and midwifery staff, professional and technical staff, administrative and clerical staff, ambulance staff, ancillary staff, and any other staff.

Mr. John Patten: The table shows the approximate number of combinations of grade and area of work, for each staff group in the English NHS at 30 September 1983.

The number of different areas of work recorded depends upon the occupation coding structure, which is designed to reflect the information needs of local managers.

Staff group	Number
Medical and Dental	410
Nursing and Midwifery	*1,340
Professional and Technical	530
Administrative and Clerical	1,650
Ambulance Staff (including Officers)	90
Ancillary	510
Others (Works/Maintenance)	380
Total	4,910

* This total takes account of
(a) the full implementation of the 25 new pay scales introduced with the 1982 NHS reorganisation (not all of these scales were operative by 30 September 1982).
(b) About 20 obsolete pay grades used for staff on protected terms and conditions of service following the 1982 reorganisations.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service staff have been prosecuted in the past year for pilfering and fraud, respectively; and what was the lowest sum involved in each category of presentation.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this information centrally.

Hypothermia

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the numbers of deaths from hypothermia for each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; and of those annual total deaths, how many occurred to children under one year old, people over 65 years of age and people over 80 years of age, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The numbers of deaths with mention of hypothermia are shown in the table.

Number of deaths with mention of hypothermia for selected age-groups, 1974 to 1983 England and Wales

Year	Age
	All ages	Under 1	Over 65 years	Over 80 years
1974	401	23	308	148
1975	511	12	428	232
1976	585	15	482	246
1977	613	18	501	254
1978	708	26	588	301
1979	824	20	676	331
1980	596	13	486	215
1981	685	9	570	297
1982	671	18	533	296
1983	539	9	444	235

Over 65 (or over 80) years of age is interpreted as aged 66 (or 81) and over. The figures for over 80 years are included in those for over 65 years.

Dentists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown of the distribution of dentists in the United Kingdom area by area.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of dentists in the general dental service, the Community Dental Service and Hospital Service in the United Kingdom on 30 September 1983 is in the table. For information in respect of general dental practitioners only, subdivided by family practitioner committee area in England, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 28 November 1984 at columns 526-30.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the infant mortality rate at the latest available date among families of (a) unskilled workers and (b) professional workers.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is shown in the table. The figures relate to legitimate births only, as the social class of fathers of all illegitimate babies is not available. In 1983, the infant mortality rate of all illegitimate babies was 13·3 per thousand illegitimate live births. The overall infant mortality rate for 1983 was 10·1 per thousand live births.

Drugs

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which products of which companies are on the non-reimbursable list for drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are consulting the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry on the content of the limited list. Until this consultation is complete it is not possible to list the medicines which will no longer be available under the National Health Service.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what expert machinery he is developing to assess new drugs currently under research which are to be reimbursable in the future;

(2) whether his Department has considered the prescribing anomalies which could arise as a result of the removal from the National Health Service of each drug which it is proposed will not be available from April 1985;

(3) whether his Department has undertaken individual evaluation of the likely medical and social impacts of the proposed removal in April 1985 of certain drugs currently prescribed under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These matters will be fully considered during our consultations with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether the World Health Organisation essential drug list was used by his Department in the selection of those drugs which will continue to be available under the National Health Service after the proposed introduction of a limited list of generic medicines;

(2) why the terms of product licences and data sheets issued and approved by his Department were not used in determining which drugs would continue to be available under the National Health Service after the proposed introduction of a limited list of drugs rather than the British National Formulary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The list of drugs to remain available on the National Health Service will not be determined until our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry is complete. No single source of information was used to prepare the provisional list published on 8 November.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he plans to extend the proposed restrictions to doctors' prescribing of medicines beyond the therapy classes currently proposed; and for which other illnesses he believes it reasonable to limit treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. We have announced the full extent of the therapeutic categories covered by our limited list proposals.

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish any information he has about the price in the United Kingdom of drugs and medicines whose prescription he proposes to restrict, and their price in other countries.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The drugs to remain available on the National Health Service in the categories affected by our limited list proposals will not be finalised until full consultation has taken place.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will exclude from the limited list of drugs any product still protected by patent.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our stated intention is to provide an adequate range of cheap and effective generic drugs in the therapeutic categories covered by our limited list proposals. We are now consulting to ensure that no essential drug is omitted from the list.

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pre-printed letters in an identical format his Department has received from doctors protesting about restrictions on National Health Service prescribing; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Hon. Members have to date sent us 145 copies of a pre-printed letter circulated by Roche Products Ltd. This letter simply requires the doctor to endorse it with his surgery stamp, sign it and send it to his Member of Parliament. I believe the company supplied a stamped envelope addressed to the doctor's own Member of Parliament for the purpose. The letter contains a number of inaccuracies and misleading statements. We shall be replying to all letters, including this prepared campaigning letter, in due course.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of his letter of 8 November to the British Medical Association about limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. Copies of my letter have now been placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he rejects the introduction of generic prescribing or generic substitution in the family practitioner services of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not reject generic prescribing. We have always encouraged doctors to prescribe generically whenever possible. A scheme of compulsory generic substitution across all therapeutic groups would be indiscriminate and would have an adverse effect on the research based pharmaceutical industry in this country. In addition the medical profession have raised with us what they see as a serious problem of legal liability if such a scheme were introduced.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) from whom he obtained advice in selecting the drugs to be included in the limited list he announced on 8 November;

(2) if he will give the number of prescriptions dispensed on the National Health Service in 1983 of each of the drugs which will no longer be available for prescription under the National Health Service on the basis used to calculate the estimated savings given in his statement on 8 November;

(3) if he will list the drugs which will no longer be permitted to be prescribed under the National Health Service, giving the cost of the private purchase of each drug by a patient on the basis used to calculate the estimated savings given in his statement on 8 November;

(4) if he will give details of how he arrived at the estimated savings to the National Health Service from the introduction of limited list prescribing mentioned in his statement of 8 November.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our estimate of savings from the introduction of limited list prescribing is based upon the cost to the National Health Service of drugs within the broad therapeutic groups under consideration. We are consulting the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry on the content of the limited list and until this consultation is complete it is not possible to list the medicines which will no longer be available under the National Health Service or their individual costs. No single source of information was used to prepare the provisional list published on 8 November.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why no middle-range pain killers are included in the limited list he announced on 8 November.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Analgesics for the relief of moderate to severe pain are not affected by the limited list proposals.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his Department's evidence to the Greenfield committee rejected the idea of limited list prescribing in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The paper prepared by officials of our Department and put to the Greenfield committee in 1981 rejected the idea of a limited list of drugs across all therapeutic groups. It was not concerned with the present proposals, which affect only less essential therapeutic categories.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of items which will be bought across the counter by patients who formerly bought them on prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We cannot estimate this. It will be a matter of personal choice.

NHS (Infertility Treatment)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which National Health Service hospitals offer infertility treatment;

(2) which National Health Service hospitals offer in vitro fertilisation;

(3) if he will list the establishments where Government funded research into infertility and its causes is carried out.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information routinely about NHS infertility services. There are many infertility treatment techniques available and it is usual for gynaecology departments to offer some of them.

In a new and specialist field of medicine such as in vitro fertilisation a distinction cannot realistically be drawn between research and treatment.

The following hospitals have confirmed that they have in vitro fertilisation programmes:

The Hammersmith hospital, London
Chelsea hospital for women, London
Royal Free hospital, London
St. Bartholomew's hospital, London
King's college hospital, London
St. Mary's central, Manchester
Southmead hospital, Bristol
Bristol royal infirmary
Birmingham maternity hospital
Jessop hospital for women, Sheffield

The main Government funded body supporting research in this field is the Medical Research Council from its grant-in-aid under the science budget of the Department of Education and Science.

I understand from the council that the MRC is supporting major programmes of research at the reproductive biology unit, Edinburgh and at the department of anatomy and obstetrics and gynaecology at the University of Cambridge.

The MRC also supports research relevant to infertility and its causes at the experimental embryology and teratology unit, Carshalton, at the department of obstetrics and gynaecology at Glasgow university and at the institute of obstetrics and gynaecology in London.

In addition the MRC supports research at a number of other centres which could prove relevant to our understanding of this problem.

Action on Smoking and Health

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what public funds from his Department are paid in the current year to Action on Smoking and Health; and how this compares with each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: The information is as follows:

Grant to Action on Smoking and Health

Year	£
1984-85	136,000
1983-84	118,000
1982-83	115,000
1981-82	90,000
1980-81	80,000
1979-80	70,000
1978-79	59,500
1977-78	41,500
1976-77	31,000
1975-76	18,500

NHS (Chief Executive)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce the appointment of a chief executive of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The chairman of the NHS management board is expected to be announced shortly.

NHS (War Preparations)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he hopes to issue the revised version of HDC(77)1, "The Preparation and Organisation of the Health Service for War".

Mr. John Patten: Copies of a preliminary draft of revised planning guidelines for the care of the sick and injured in war were sent to the British Medical Association and the Royal College of Nursing at the end of July with an invitation to comment on the draft and the offer of discussions to facilitate consideration. A response from the British Medical Association is awaited.

Because of the importance of the subject, we also propose to provide for full consultation on the draft with the National Health Service and other interests. I cannot say at present when a revised circular will be issued.

Population Statistics

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report all borough or district council areas with populations below 120,000 which have their own fully manned local office of his Department with figures for the respective populations that they aim to serve.

Mr. Newton: I regret that this information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Local Offices

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the criteria of geography, population, and communication which determine his deployment of local offices of his Department round the country;

(2) what criteria a borough or district council area has to satisfy in order to obtain its own local office of his Department.

Mr. Newton: The main criterion for the deployment of the Department's local offices is to provide the best possible service to the public while at the same time exercising proper economy in administration.

The provision of a local office is not linked to a borough or district council area. However, in determining local office boundaries account is taken of the following criteria; these are not listed in any particular order:

(i) Accessibility of offices to the public.
(ii) Organisation of the work in the most economical way.
(iii) The need for liaison and co-operation with local authorities. As a general rule local office boundaries should not cross those of social service departments and should coincide as far as possible with those of housing departments.
(iv) Liaison and co-operation with unemployment benefit offices.
(v) Ease of identification of the local office covering a given address.

Occupational Asthma Scheme

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many posters have been printed about the occupational asthma scheme; and how many of them have been distributed.

Mr. Newton: 23,000 copies of an occupational asthma poster were printed and distributed in July 1984.

Two copies of the poster were sent to welfare/medical officers of relevant industries (10,000 copies), trade union secretaries (5,500 copies), citizens advice bureaux (2,000 copies), DHSS offices (3,000 copies). The remainder is held in stock at our leaflets unit.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims have been made under the occupational asthma scheme (PD 53) since its introduction.

Mr. Newton: 1,343 claims have been made between 29 March 1982, when occupational asthma was prescribed as an industrial disease, and 25 September 1984, the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in respect of each of the seven listed groups in the occupational asthma scheme (PD53), how many claims were successful and how many claims were unsuccessful.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. However, the following table shows, in respect of each of the seven listed agents, the number of successful claims for occupational asthma and the number of claims where the disease was not diagnosed following examination by a special medical board.

Agents	Successful claims	Disease not diagnosed
(a) Isocyanates	154	48
(b) Platinum salts	15	—
(c) Fumes/dusts from certain hardening agents	23	33
(d) Soldering flux fumes	67	38

(f) Animals/insects	18	14
(g) Flour/grain dusts	99	91

Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many males and how many females have been treated under the National Health Service for sexually transmitted diseases in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available in each of the following age groups (a) under 17, (b) 18 to 24, (c) 24 to 39 and (d) 40 or more years of age.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information in precisely the form requested. The available figures are in the tables:

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning expenditure upon and allocation of National Health Service personnel to the treatment of sexually transmitted diseases in patients aged under 16 years of age in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by region and by date of each reported case of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the United Kingdom over the last two years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is as follows:

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the expenditure upon and allocation of personnel to the treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers in the United Kingdom by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information from health authorities which would enable us to identify the allocation of NHS resources specifically devoted to the treatment of AIDS.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been treated for cancer of the cervix in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available in each of the following age groups (a) under 17, (b) 18 to 24, (c) 24 to 39 and (d) 40 or more years of age.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is given in the table:

Home Helps

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in the Official Report the number of home helps employed per thousand of population, at the latest date for which figures are available to his Department in (a) East Sussex, (b) West Sussex, (c) Devon, (d) Newcastle upon Tyne, (e) Manchester and (f) Sheffield.

Mr. John Patten: The following information as at 30 September 1983 is the latest available:

Number of home helps per thousand population

	Number
(a) East Sussex	0·9
(b) West Sussex	0·7
(c) Devon	0·8
(d) Newcastle Upon Tyne	2·5
(e) Manchester	1·5
(f) Sheffield	1·8

Foetal Material

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Service (1) if he will list those National Health Service hospitals and private nursing homes which supply the foetal tissue bank at the Royal Marsden hospital, London, with dead foetal material; whether the Royal Marsden Hospital pays for this service; and whether it is the sole purchaser of material from these sources;

(2) if officials from his Department carried out an investigation in 1983 into allegations of a trade in dead foetal material between British abortion clinics and French cosmetic companies;

(3) if he will list those establishments approved by his Department or by the Medical Research Council to store dead foetal materia and those establishments licensed to use such material for experimentation; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what safeguards exist to prevent the sale of dead foetal material from abortions to commercial concerns; whether any National Health Service hospital or private nursing home receives income from selling foetal material to commercial concerns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The use and disposal of foetal material in England is very closely controlled in accordance with the code of practice recommended in the Report of the advisory group on the use of foetuses and foetal material for research (the Peel report 1972). Within the National HealthService control is the responsibility of health authorities and details of such arrangements are not held centrally. The supply of material from approved nursing homes is monitored by our Department. We approved the supply of foetal material by nursing homes as follows. No charge is made for the supply.

Blackdown Nursing Home
Birmingham Maternity Hospital and East Birmingham Hospital
Calthorpe Nursing Home
Birmingham Children's Hospital, East Birmingham Hospital and Birmingham Maternity Hospital

London Private Hospital
Foetal Tissue Bank, Royal Marsden Hospital
Park View Clinic
Foetal Tissue Bank, Royal Marsden Hospital
Raleigh Nursing Home
Foetal Tissue Bank, Royal Marsden Hospital
Robert Nursing Home
Birmingham University Medical School
Wistans Nursing Home
St. Bartholomew's Hospital and East Birmingham Hospital

The Medical Research Council does not control the storage or use of material in this way. However foetal material from the bank is supplied only to research centres in the United Kingdom and not to overseas establishments. All establishments using such material must obtain prior approval from the local ethical committee.

The allegations that foetal material from United Kingdom sources was being supplied to French cosmetic companies were investigated at the time by our Department. No evidence to support the allegations was found.

Outpatient Waiting Lists

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the waiting time for (a) outpatient appointments and (b) operations in the ear, nose and throat specialties in (i) the United Kingdom, (ii) England and (iii) each of the English health authorities.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not collected centrally in precisely the form requested. I shall let the right hon. Member have the available information as soon as possible.

ENT Consultants

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many ear, nose and throat consultant posts there are per million population in each of the English health regions; how many in each region are currently vacant; and what has been the change in the number of (a) established and (b) filled posts since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is set out in the table.

Note:
Numbers of consultants at 30 September, including SHMO with allowance.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes in the number of ear, nose and throat consultant posts have occurred since 1979 in districts which have hospitals associated with medical schools or institutes providing postgraduate training in the ear, nose and throat specialties.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information in the form requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which health districts have made savings, and of what amount, by reducing the number of ear, nose and throat consultant posts and ear, nose and throat beds; which have closed ear, nose and throat hospitals; and which have plans to do so.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This detailed information is not readily available centrally. On a national basis, however, the number of inpatient and day cases treated in the ear, nose and throat specialty increased from 260,000 in 1978 to 305,000 in 1983 and the number of outpatient attendances rose from 1·9 million to 2·1 million.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will request health authorities to inform him of any proposed hospital closures; and if he will require them to ensure before closure that adequate provision is made with new investment if necessary, for the patients normally treated at the hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities are required to consult locally on all proposals for permanent hospital closure, and to notify our Department at the same time.

If the community health council does not agree with the proposals, they cannot proceed without reference to Ministers. We consider all such cases very carefully, including details of alternative provision, before making a final decision.

Postgraduate Hospitals

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how the addition of the specialist postgraduate hospitals to the responsibilities of district health authorities affected the application of the formula of the resource allocation working party to the districts concerned; what will be the position when the protected funding of the hospital ends; and if he will ensure that there is continued recognition of the national role of these hospitals;

(2) if he will give figures for the London postgraduate hospitals that had their own board of governors before reorganisation, showing the revenue and capital available to each in the last year before reorganisation, and that available in the current year; what was the percentage charge for each; and which are run by special health authorities and which by district health authorities;

(3) whether any restrictions were placed on the spending of the protected funding of the postgraduate London hospitals now run by district health authorities; whether the protected funding is being fully spent by the hospitals for which it was intended; whether and for which hospitals there has been any borrowing by the district health authority; whether there are plans to maintain the future funding of these specialist hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

NHS (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the gross income to the National Health Service from charges made for pathology and radiology work, respectively, carried out for private patients of consultants; what is the net income from each; and what is the current scale of charges;

(2) what are the estimated losses of revenue to the National Health Service in the 10 worst cases of undercharging or failure to charge revealed by his recent survey of health authorities' charging arrangements;

(3) what is the gross income for National Health Service hospitals from charges to road accident victims, private patients and overseas visitors, respectively; and what is the net income in each case;

(4) what is his estimate of the gross income for National Health Service hospitals from charges to road accident victims, private patients and overseas visitors, respectively if all such charges had been fully levied.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service consultants and administrators are to be disciplined or prosecuted as a result of his recent inquiry into the failure of health authorities properly to levy charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Sanctions against employees are a matter for health authorities, which are not required to report this information to us.

Maternity Services Advisory Committee

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to re-appoint the Maternity Services Advisory Committee after its third report is published.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 27 November at column 469-70.

Perinatal Mortality

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report those district health authorities in the West Midlands with a higher perinatal mortality rate than the present average for the region.

Mr. John Patten: The district health authorities in which the perinatal mortality rates for 1981-83 were higher than the average for the west midlands region over that period are as follows. A group of years has been used to minimise the effect of random fluctuations of rates based on small numbers.

Herefordshire District Health Authority
Shropshire District Health Authority
North Staffordshire District Health Authority
Rugby District Health Authority
Central Birmingham District Health Authority
East Birmingham District Health Authority
West Birmingham District Health Authority
Coventry District Health Authority
Sandwell District Health Authority
Walsall District Health Authority
Wolverhampton District Health Authority

Neonatal Intensive Care Units

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Offical Report the names and locations of each neonatal intensive care unit in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Regional health authorities designate certain special care baby units to provide neonatal intensive care, but such care is also provided by some other such units. Because there is at present no firm definition of intensive care, it is not possible, on a routine basis, to identify and collect centrally details of all the units that give such care.

Health Visitors

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to increase the recruitment of health visitors; and how many are at present (a) in training and (b) employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for health authorities to determine the need for any increased provision for health visitors in their districts but we have, over a 3-year period, made extra money available to inner city health authorities for the training of additional health visitors and district nurses. At 30 September 1983 there were, in whole-time equivalent terms, 1,023 student health visitors and 9,708 health visitors, including field work teachers and multiple duty staff, employed in the National Health Service in England.

Community Care

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to provide additional central funding to health authorities for care in the community.

Mr. John Patten: Central funding for care in the community will be provided in 1985-86 and subsequent years through initiatives already announced. No new proposals are contemplated at present.

Black Foster Parents

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to recruit more black foster parents.

Mr. John Patten: The Government accept that there is a need for fostering agencies to recruit sufficient foster parents from ethnic minority groups to meet the needs of black children in care. The Department is currently preparing a public service advertisement for television to encourage foster parents of all ethnic groups to come forward. The review of the regulations governing fostering which is just beginning will include consideration whether to require authorities to have regard to any wishes of a child or its parent about cultural upbringing.

NHS (Managers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with representatives of the National and Local Government Officers Association about the appointment of Health Service managers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None. I am considering a request for a meeting about the personnel consequences of the appointment of general managers.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deportation (Commonwealth Citizens)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Commonwealth citizens were (a) deported and (b) removed from the United Kingdom for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested on deportations and the removal of illegal entrants is published annually in "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom" (tables 19 and 20 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9246).

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of the Metropolitan police on the use of dogs.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that Metropolitan police dogs are used at the discretion of local commanders in a wide variety of circumstances. Dogs are trained to track, to search for persons or property, and to detain escaping suspects. They are always deployed under strict supervision, and under force orders should not be used in any situation which might restrict the animal's freedom of movement or reduce the handler's ability to control it.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the published figures for clear-up rates in the Metropolitan police area for the first six months of 1984 include any changes which result from the experiment referred to in his written answer of 28 November, Official Report, c. 493.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984, c. 4]: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that offences cleared up as a result of the experimental scheme of interviewing prisoners about otherwise unsolved crimes will be included in the statistics in the usual way. The scheme was introduced in April 1984 after earlier pilot schemes in two divisions, but, as there is inevitably some delay before admitted offences can be verified and recorded, it is unlikely that the statistics for the first six months of 1984 will have been materially affected. The scheme will be fully evaluated after it has been in operation for 12 months.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the crime rates and clear-up rates in the Metropolitan police area in each quarter since March 1979; what is the crime rate and clear-up rate in total and for each standard category of crime in each Metropolitan police district in each quarter in 1983 and to date; and if he will give the establishment and number of police actually on duty in each Metropolitan police district in each quarter in 1983 and to date.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 29 November, 1984, c. 545]: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the available information is as given in the following four tables and in the set of more detailed tables which I am sending to the hon. Member and placing in the Library of the House, giving the number of offences recorded and the number cleared up in each district for each of the main offence groups in each quarter from the beginning of 1983 to the second quarter of 1984.

Clear-up rates differ markedly according to the type of offence and its circumstances both within offence groups and between offence groups. Variations in clear-up rates between districts reflect variations in the types and circumstances of the offence recorded. The number of offences cleared up and the clear-up rate may also be affected by variations in police recording practices. Offences cleared up in one period may include offences initially recorded in previous periods. Clear-up rates may be particularly misleading if they are based on small numbers of recorded offences.

Information is not available on the numbers of police on duty, which vary according to need and depend upon the operation of the shift system, training commitments, the provision of aid to other forces or to other parts of the MPD, annual leave and sick leave, and so on.

Greater Manchester Police Authority

Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure incurred by the Greater Manchester police authority in each of the last four financial years; and how that expenditure has compared with the targets set by the Government.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is as follows:

	Total expenditure of Greater Manchester police authority (net of police grant) £ million	Target of Greater Manchester County Council £ million
1980-81	48,619	—
1981-82	57,575	221·19
1982-83	64·285	216·913
1983-84	66·97	234·227

There is no separate target for police authority expenditure.

Royal College of Surgeons (Research Establishment)

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give the specific dates in the last 10 years when his Department's inspectors visited the research establishment of the Royal College of Surgeons at Downe, Kent; and whether on any of those occasions his Department's inspectors made any recommendations for changes.

Mr. Mellor: Records of inspections at Downe over the last five years show visits by inspectors on the following dates:

9 February 1980
4 June 1980
23 September 1980
25 March 1981
7 April 1981
23 June 1981

29 March 1983
11 August 1983
18 October 1983
22 February 1984
16 May 1984

Inspectors' reports are made in confidence to the Secretary of State.

Young Prisoners

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the certified normal accommodation for each remand centre for young prisoners aged between 17 and 21 years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
Males
Ashford*	380
Brockhill	177
Cardiff	85
Chelmsford	66
Exeter	48
Glen Parva	120
Latchmere House	128

Swansea	55
Thorpe Arch	164
Winchester	66
Females
Low Newton*	35
Pucklechurch*	56
Risley*	84

* These remand centres also hold adult prisoners.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young persons aged 15 to 21 years who were on remand were drafted out of remand prisons for young prisoners to other Prison Department establishments during (a) 1983 and (b) the first 10 months of 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available.

Parole

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many persons sentenced to youth custody had been released on parole licence and have been supervised by local authority social workers in England and Wales since the implementation of part 1, sections 1 to 10, of the Criminal Justice Act 1982;

(2) how many young persons aged 15 to 21 years have been released on parole from youth custody establishments and are in addition subject to a local authority care order.

Mr. Mellor: The number of persons released on parole licence who have been supervised by local authority social workers and/or who are also subject to a local authority care order are not recorded centrally, and the information requested could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. They are, however, a small proportion of the young offenders released on parole licence.

Motorways (Speeding)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the prosecution rate for speeding on Britain's motorways; and whether he is satisfied with it.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The only readily available information on prosecutions for speeding offences on motorways is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1983). We are satisfied that the police are taking appropriate action against speeding motorists within the constraints placed on them by their other duties.

Police and Fire Brigade Staff

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many (a) police and (b) fire brigade staff have been (i) assaulted and (ii) admitted to inpatient care in hospital, following assaults upon them, in each of the metropolitan counties in each of the last five years;

(2) what terms and conditions apply to (a) police and (b) fire brigade staff when unable to work, following injuries while at work;

(3) how many assaults there have been on (a) police officers and (b) fire brigade staff in the Greater London area in each of the last five years;

(4) how many (a) police and (b) fire brigade staff have been admitted to hospital inpatient care, following assaults on them, in the Greater London area in each of the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information about assaults on policemen and firemen and subsequent medical treatment is not collected centrally. The conditions of service of police officers are set out in the Police Regulations 1979 (as amended) which provide for a member of a police force to receive full pay while on sick leave and for the reimbursement of medical and dental charges. The scheme of conditions of service of the National Joint Council for Local Authorities Fire Brigades, on which my right hon. and learned Friend is not reresented, provides for a member of a fire brigade whose duties include a liability to engage in fire fighting to receive full pay while on sick leave and, at a fire authority's discretion, for the reimbursement of medical and dental charges.

Steel-toothed Traps

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to ban the use of steel-toothed traps to take fur–bearing animals in the wild.

Mr. Mellor: The use of steel-toothed traps is already an offence under the Pests Act 1954.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much time the prisoners in the CI unit for the severely disturbed at Holloway prison spend in their cell wing and how much time in the skills training unit; and whether this programme was followed during the week ended 8 December.

Mr. Mellor: Women located on C1 unit leave the unit to attend the skills training unit and also for a variety of other purposes, including visits and exercise. The skills training unit generally operates for one and half to two hours in the morning and for one and a half hours in the afternoon. For the week ending 8 December, the skills training unit opened on two mornings and three afternoons; on two mornings and one afternoon classes were conducted on C1 unit by the skills training unit staff.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what workshop facilities are available in Holloway prison; how much time each prisoner allocated to this work spends in the workshop each day; and how much time such prisoners spent in the workshop each day during the week ended 8 December.

Mr. Mellor: There are two workshops at Holloway prison; light textiles and engineering assembly. In the quarter ended 30 June 1984 prisoners in each workshop worked an average of one and a half hours daily. The workshops have been closed since July 1984 due to shortage of staff. It is anticipated that they will open again after Christmas.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the week ended 8 December, what was the number of prisoners in Holloway prison; how many prisoners were allocated work duties outside their cell wing; and for how many hours per day.

Mr. Mellor: The number of prisoners in Holloway prison during the week ending 8 December ranged from 306 on 2 December to 345 on 8 December. The current work force stands at 61. Normal work hours for 37 prisoners are from 9.15 am to 11.30 am and from 2.15 pm to 4.00 pm. Workers in the kitchen, reception and officers' mess are engaged for rather longer hours.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the full complement of prison officers, of all grades, at Holloway prison; and what was the actual number of officers on duty each day during the week ended 8 December.

Mr. Mellor: The authorised staffing level of prison officers on discipline duties at Holloway is 335. The staff in post figure is 317, but seven additional staff were posted to Holloway on detached duty throughout the week ending 8 December. The number on duty each day varies according to the shift system and routine in operation at the prison and is also affected by the incidence of annual leave and sick leave and the absence of staff undergoing training. During the week ending 8 December the numbers on duty througout each 24 hour period were:

2 December: 184
3 December: 218
4 December: 201
5 December: 208
6 December: 204
7 December: 118
8 December: 122

Television Licences

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of people without a current television licence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We estimate that about 1·6 million households with television do not have a licence.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Authority Higher Education

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the expenditure on local authority higher education (a) nationally and (b) within Stockport metropolitan borough council in the current financial year; and what are the projected figures for 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: The size of the capped advanced further education pool in England for 1984-85 determined by my right hon. Friend is £580·5 million. The allocation to Stockport MBC is £1·765 million. Outturn expenditure both nationally and in Stockport will not be known until the autumn of next year. My right hon. Friend has determined the size of the capped AFE pool for 1985-86 at £620 million. He expects to announce allocations to authorities later this month after receiving the advice of the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education.

School Meals

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the amount of subsidy paid per annum to provide school meals in England; and what proportion is paid to subsidise the cost of midday meals to boarding pupils.

Mr. Dunn: The net recurrent cost of the school meals service in 1982-83, the latest year for which firm figures are available, was £411 million (cash). Information on the subsidy of midday meals to boarding pupils is not available.

Dyslexia

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the British Dyslexia Association about training of teachers of those with special learning difficulties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: In July the British Dyslexia Association submitted proposals for a modular teaching diploma which would offer an additional qualification for teachers working with children with specific learning difficulties. These were carefully considered both within the Department and by Her Majesty's Inspectorate and a reply was sent to the association in October. It is now for the BDA to consider how it wishes to take forward its plans.

Students (Financial Support)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce the terms of reference, composition and timetable of the body to review student financial support; whether the review will be conducted by an independent body; and whether its findings and recommendations will be published.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 10 December 1984, at column 333. The announcement will contain all relevant information about the review.

Support Grants

Mr. Jeremy Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the expenditure to be supported through education support grants in 1985-86.

Sir Keith Joseph: On 12 June I announced the Government's intention to support through education support grants in the financial year 1985-86 up to £30 million of expenditure by local education authorities in England. The activities to be supported were selected following detailed consultation with the local authority associations and were set out in the Education Support Grants Regulations 1984. Ninety-five authorities have bid for grant support and for each of the 11 categories of activity for which bids were invited the total of the bids exceeded the expenditure which could be supported.

Education support grants are intended to encourage local education authorities to redeploy a limited amount of expenditure towards activities with national priority in the education service. They should have an important contribution to make in promoting continuing improvements in the education service and in assisting local education authorities to respond to changing demands. Following careful consideration of the bids, local education authorities are being informed of the levels of expenditure for each category of activity which I have approved for the financial year 1985-86 for the purposes of the Education Support Grants Regulations 1984.

Table A sets out for each category of activity the level of expenditure and the number of authorities to be supported through education support grants in the financial year 1985-86. Approval has been given so far in respect of £28·85 million of expenditure.

Within this total, approval has so far been given in respect of expenditure of £1·85 million for pilot projects concerned with records of achievement. A further £0·15 million, to provide for extensions to planned projects, will be allocated after discussion with the authorities concerned. No decisions have yet been taken about the allocation between authorities of the £1 million to be supported on the management and appraisal of school teachers.

Table B sets out the expenditure which I have approved for the financial year 1985-86 for the purposes of the Education Support Grants Regulations 1984 in respect of each category of activity for each authority. Fuller details about the allocations are set out in a note which has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

Table A

The level of expenditure for each category of activity to be supported through Education Support Grants in the 1985-86 financial year

Category of Activity	Expenditure to be supported in the financial year 1985-86 £ million	Number of authorities in respect of which expenditure has been approved

PRIME MINISTER

Lord Cockfield

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what representations Her Majesty's Government have received from any of the institutions of the European Community regarding the legal problems arising from the appointment of Lord Cockfield as a European Economic Community Commissioner.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what legal advice from outside Government she sought regarding the appointment of a Member of the House of Lords as a European Commissioner.

The Prime Minister: The compatibility of Lord Cockfield's appointment as commissioner with his membership of the House of Lords was initially raised by Members of the European Parliament. It was accordingly considered by the Commission and Council Legal Services. They have concluded that there is no incompatibility in such cases where the Member concerned takes leave of absence from the House of Lords for the duration of his appointment as a commissioner.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will reconsider the appointment of Lord Cockfield as an EEC Commissioner, in view of the legal problem arising from his position as a Member of the House of Lords.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what remuneration, benefits and payments of any kind are being made or have been made in the current year from public funds to Lord Cockfield.

The Prime Minister: Until 10 September 1984, Lord Cockfield received his ministerial salary and all necessary expenses incurred as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Since then he has been provided with secretarial support, accommodation and transport in connection with his duties as a United Kingdom member of the next European Commission.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister under which head of expenditure the current cost of the office, secretary, ministerial car and driver of Lord Cockfield is met.

The Prime Minister: The necessary expenses of both United Kingdom members of the next European Commission will be met from Subhead A1 of Class XIII, Vote 19 until they take up their appointments on 6 January 1985. These include the provision of secretarial support, accommodation and travel within the United Kingdom.

EC (Aid)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister, of the 1·2 million tonnes of grain for African countries agreed at the European Council on 3 and 4 December, how much will come from (a) individual member states, (b) stocks under the intervention policies of the common agricultural policy and (c) other sources.

The Prime Minister: Detailed arrangements to implement the decision of the European Council to provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to Africa are still under discussion. However, the understanding reached at Dublin was that member states would provide 450,000 tonnes; and that the Community would provide the remainder with financing being drawn from the budget and from the emergency provisions of the Lomé convention. The Commission will make proposals for the procurement of grain when it proposes allocations to recipient countries.

THE ARTS

British Museum (Redecoration)

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations he has received concerning the redecoration of the entrance hall of the British museum, advocating the reinstatement of the 19th century colour scheme.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts has received representations advocating the reinstatement of the original 19th century colour scheme of the entrance hall of the British museum from The Georgian Group.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Pensioners (Taxation)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing tax break-even points, defined as the income levels at which tax paid equals state pension received, for each of a single pensioner and a married pensioner, in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Moore: The information is as follows for taxpayers over 65 receiving the standard rate of national insurance retirement pension. The operation of the investment income surcharge in years before 1984-85 affects the figures for married couples. The table shows minimum and maximum figures.

Levels of total income at which liability to income tax equals receipt of national insurance pension

£ per annum

	Single	Married
		*Minimum	Maximum†
1979-80	5,179	7,418	7,755
1980-81	6,022	8,519	9,000
1981-82	6,369	9,227	9,923
1982-83	7,124	10,259	10,892
1983-84	7,918	11,308	12,028
1984-85	8,342	12,779	12,779

* Assuming that all income other than national insurance retirement pension is investment income.

† Assuming that all income is earned.

Scotland (Wealth Statistics)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage of total wealth in Scotland held by the top 1 per cent., top 10 per cent. and top 20 per cent. in 1979-80 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Moore: I regret that estimates of the distribution of wealth in Scotland are not available.

Scotland (Estates)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the number of estates declared at a value of £1 million or over in Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Moore: The number of such estates reported to the Capital Taxes Office in Edinburgh were:

	Number
1979-80	4
1980-81	8
1981-82	9
1982-83	10
1983-84	11

Scotland (Taxation)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage of the total taxes gathered by the Inland Revenue in Scotland through capital gains, estate duty and capital transfer tax in 1979-80 and at the latest date.

Mr. Moore: Estimates can be given of the yields of each of these taxes in Scotland as a percentage of the total yield of the tax in the United Kingdom, as follows:

	1979-80 percentage	Receipts in latest year
Capital gains tax assessed by districts in Scotland	6	To October 1984 5 per cent. (provisional)
Capital transfer tax/estate duty	11	To March 1984 5 per cent.

Because of centralised collection arrangements it would not be meaningful to express the yields as percentages of the total taxes collected by the Inland Revenue in Scotland.

EC (Budget Discipline)

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the legal status of the Council of Ministers' document on budget discipline; and whether it rests on any Commission proposal.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Council of Ministers' document on budgetary discipline takes the form of "Conclusions of the Council". By adopting it, the Council has bound itself to observe the rules laid down in it governing both agricultural and non-agricultural expenditure. The legal status of the text could in the last resort be decided only by the European Court.

The document does not itself rest on any proposal from the Commission, but the Commission's undertakings relating to its own role in agricultural price fixing have been annexed to the Council document.

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Council of Ministers' document on budget discipline is for internal application to the Council only.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Council of Ministers' document on budget discipline represents the Council's conclusions on the procedures it will observe in its role as part of the budgetary authority. The Commission has also, however, given specific undertakings regarding its role in the agricultural price-fixing and in the management of agricultural spending. These undertakings are an integral part of the system and the text of them is annexed to the Council's conclusions.

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the Council of Ministers considers its budget discipline proposals affect the rights of the European Parliament as one of the arms of budgetary authority.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The conclusions adopted by the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 December on measures to guarantee the effective application of budgetary discipline bind the Council to observe them in its role as part of the budgetary authority. The text does not affect Parliament's rights under the treaty in relation to non-obligatory expenditure. In addition, the Council has said it wishes to explore with both Commission and Parliament ways of co-operating over budgetary discipline and has specifically sought a meeting with the Parliament before it establishes the reference framework at the beginning of the budgetary procedure.

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, taking into account the number of caveats concerning agricultural expenditure, will be the effect of the Council of Ministers' views on budget discipline on non-obligatory expenditure and in particular the European Social Fund and the European Regional Development Fund and Development Co-operation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Under the budgetary discipline rules, agricultural expenditure must grow less than the own resources base. The rules also contain provisions to avoid base drift in the calculation of the agricultural guideline and to enable any excess agricultural expenditure that does have to be conceded to be clawed back over the following two years. As regards non-obligatory expenditure the Council has undertaken to observe the maximum rate laid down in article 203 of the treaty throughout the budgetary procedure. The provision of finance for the European social fund and the European regional development fund will depend upon how the total amount available for non-obligatory expenditure within the maximum rate is distributed. But the Brussels European Council agreed on the need for increasing the provision for both research and development and structural funds.

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Council of Ministers' document on budget discipline concentrates on mechanisms of budget discipline.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The principles of budgetary discipline were drawn up by heads of State and Government at the Brussels European Council in March and formally endorsed by them at Fontainebleau in June. The remit to Ministers, which has been fulfilled by the text agreed on 4 December, was to reach agreement on the measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of these principles.

Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Council of Minister's document on budget discipline does not define the objectives of such discipline; and if he will take steps to secure the inclusion of specific objectives on budget discipline.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The objectives of budgetary discipline were defined by Heads of State and Government at the Brussels and Fontainebleau European Councils. They were that there should be an overall limit on budgetary expenditure, that the rate of growth of agricultural spending should be less than that of the own resources base and that the maximum rate provisions of the treaty should be strictly observed. All three objectives are clearly covered by the provisions of the Council of Ministers' conclusions.

EC (Aid Provision)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage decrease in (a) nominal and (b) real terms in the level of aid designated in the draft 1985 European Economic Community budget compared to the 1984 European Economic Community budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Title 9 of the draft Community budget for 1985, which cover co-operation with developing and non-member countries, shows a decrese of 0·8 per cent. in cash terms following the decision made at the Budget Council on 29 November. No estimate is available of the change in real terms. All Community expenditure, including non-agricultural expenditure has been constrained in 1985 by the need to remain within the 1 per cent. VAT limit.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the extra expenditure in the draft 1985 European Economic Community budget necessitated by the provision of 1·2 million tonnes of grain to African countries, as agreed by the European Council; and under what headings the increased expenditure falls.

Mr. Ian Stewart: This commitment will be met from the resources of the Commission and the member states. The Community's contribution will be drawn from the European development fund (which is not part of the Community budget) and from the food aid provisions in the budget.

Financial Management Unit

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if a decision has yet been made on the future of the financial management unit.

Mr. Peter Rees: The financial management unit completes its final term at the end of this year. Its valuable work in helping Departments to imporve financial management will be carried forward by a small group which is being established in the Treasury and Cabinet Office in January. The primary function of this group will be to assist the top management of the two Departments to provide effective leadership in carrying through the programme of management reform in the Civil Service designed to secure better value for money. The setting up of the new group is in line with the recommendations of the report by the Efficiency Unit on consultancy, inspection and review services published on 4 December, and one of its early tasks will be to stimulate and monitor progress in implementing that report.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Bankruptcies

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies were declared bankrupt in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Fletcher: Bankruptcies and company liquidations in England and Wales in these years were published in British Business, 26 October 1984. Figures for Scotland are as follows:

	*Sequestrations	Company liquidations†
1979	106	238
1980	150	379
1981	181	438
1982	213	503
1983	282	521

* Equivalent to bankruptcies in England and Wales and covers all individuals and partnerships.

† Compulsory plus creditors voluntary — the two types which involve insolvency.

Electronic Research

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was spent on electronics research in the last year for which figures are available; and what are the relevant percentages which went to (a) defence and (b) the non-defence areas.

Mr. Pattie: The latest available information shows industry expenditure on research and development in electronics products of £1,221 million in 1981. No information is available on the amount spent for defence.

Tourism

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to encourage tourism by American visitors in the regions.

Mr. Butcher: My department encourages tourism to and within Britain through the work of the statutory tourist boards—the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board. It is mainly for the industry to develop facilities, attractions and hold events to encourage tourists to visit particular regions. Support for this work is provided by the English Tourist Board and the non-statutory regional tourist boards through grants under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 and by way of promotional activity within Britain.

The BTA feature a wide variety of attractions throughout Britain in their overseas promotional campaigns. In 1985 the BTA will be continuing with its successful theme of Britain's heritage with numerous events being staged throughout the country. Britain's heritage has a major appeal in the American market.

Biotechnology

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if support for biotechnology is included in the moratorium on research and development assistance, announced on 12 November.

Mr. Butcher: Of the range of assistance offered by the Department in support of biotechnology in industry, only research and development projects from individual firms on standard support for innovation terms are affected by the restrictions on new applications that my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology announced on 12 November.

Collaborative applied research projects and demonstration projects can still be considered. Grants also remain available for consultancy for strategic studies, feasibility studies and problem solving.

Firms with projects in mind should seek advice from the biotechnology unit at the Laboratory of the Government Chemist about the assistance available.

Electronics Components (Aid)

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will increase the level of his Department's assistance to the electronics components industry to respond to the report by the National Economic Development Office's electronics components committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie : The Electronic Components EDC, in its report to the National Economic Development Council on 5 December, provided a useful view of the electronic components industry. There is much in the conclusions and recommendations, particularly on integrated circuit manufacture in the United Kingdom, which my Department would support.

The report underlines the importance of integrated circuits, especially those designed to meet individual applications, and the connection between a strong bases in this area and a sound and competitive electronics industry. While the United Kingdom's integrated circuit industry has improved markedly in recent years, with the encouragement of Government support, the competition is also growing fast, on average between 20 and 25 per cent. yearly. My Department accepts that the United Kingdom's growth rate in production of integrated circuits must at least reflect worldwide growth, and the prime objective of the £120 million microelectronics industry support programme (MISP 2) has been to aid this development.

The EDC recommends an increase in the United Kingdom annual investment in electronics to £400 million and that additional funds and a higher level of grant are needed to achieve this.

I informed the House on 12 November that the demands on Government support for research and development have increased over recent years and that the 1985-86 allocation for innovation grants is now virtually committed. I therefore decided to review the balance of this support and announced that no further applications would be accepted while the review is being undertaken. MISP 2 is included within this review.

The Electronic Components EDC's findings and recommendations will be considered carefully by my Department and will be taken into account in the review. I undertook to report to the council in six months on the recommendations and how they may be implemented.

Columbus Space Station

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom contribution to the construction of the Columbus space station.

Mr. Pattie: The Government are considering President Reagan's invitation to participate in an international space station in the context of the proposed long-term plan of the European Space Agency, which will be decided at a Ministerial Council of the European Space Agency in January.

Advanced Manufacturing Technology

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support he will give to proposals for a national centre for advanced manufacturing technology.

Mr. Butcher: In its response to the ACARD report "New Opportunities in Manufacturing", the Government accepted that advanced manufacturing technology (AMT) activity should be concentrated in a limited number of centres. These should emerge rather than be created, and strong industrial commitment is essential. The Government will encourage the development of such centres, which would have priority for funding through normal channels. In the west midlands, Warwick university is emerging as such a centre and DTI officials are discussing ways of working with it to promote the application of AMT in the west midlands along the Telford to Rugby axis.

EC (Manufactured Trade)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the size of the deficit in manufactured trade with the European Economic Community over the past 12 months.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Data for this trade on the balance of payments basis are available only quarterly. In the year ending September 1984 the deficit was £7·9 billion.

Laboratory Accreditation

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the arrangements in his Department for laboratory accreditation.

Mr. Pattie: The British Calibration Service (BCS) and the National Testing Laboratory Accreditation Scheme (NATLAS), both operated by the National Physical Laboratory, are essential elements for laboratory accreditation in the national measurement system. The BCS is responsible for assessing and accrediting calibration laboratories and, on 1 November 1984, there were 129 accreditations in force from both the private and public sectors, with the majority from the former. NATLAS is concerned with the assessment and accreditation of testing laboratories in a wide range of physical, chemical and engineering disciplines and, at present, there are 244 accreditations in force most of which are in the private sector.

Both schemes are continuing to grow and I have decided, in the interest of improved efficiency, to merge them into a single unified scheme by 1 October 1985. The unified scheme will be known as the National Measurement Accreditation Service (NAMAS) but the terms BCS and NATLAS which are now widely recognised both in this country and abroad will be retained as groupings within the scheme.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has seen copies of the telex exchanges between the Caribbean countries involved and the European commissioner regarding the purchase of Super 748 aircraft for Leeward Islands Air Transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 439.]: I am aware that there have been extensive contacts between the Caribbean Development Bank, Leeward Islands Air Transport and the European Commission. I understand that these contacts are continuing.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on plans for the community programme in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend set out our plans for the development of the community programme in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 30 July, at columns 121-22. We have previously guaranteed its future until at least October 1986.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to extend the Manpower Services Commission community programme to two years.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 312]: No. The position has not changed since the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 7 February 1984, at column 588.

Wages Councils

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment if Her Majesty's Government intend to abolish the wages councils and minimum wage legislation.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have yet to make decisions on the future of the Wages Councils Act.

Theatre Technicians

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many vacancies for theatre technicians in regional theatres are currently advertised in jobcentres; and what were the corresponding figures in November 1983, November 1982 and November 1981, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers of men and women unemployed, and the percentage rate of unemployment, in the Armley, Bramley, Kirkstall, Pudsey North, Pudsey South and Wortley wards of Leeds city council.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment data for individual wards will not be available until the middle of next year. Furthermore, the smallest local areas for which unemployment rates are calculated are travel-to-work areas.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the percentage of people in the United Kingdom who, on becoming unemployed, find jobs within (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) 12 months; and what relationship there is between the corresponding local figures and the local overall unemployment rate.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage change in employment in England in (a) manufacturing industry and (b) the service industry for each year since 1979; what is the cumulative total since 1979; and if he will give separate figures for men and women.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is as follows:

Percentage change in employment in England

June each year	Manufacturing industries		Service industries
	Male	Female	Male	Female
1979-80	− 3·6	− 4·8	0·6	1·3
1980-81	− 9·3	−11·9	−2·5	−1·4
1981-82	− 4·4	− 5·5	−0·4	0·4
1982-83	− 4·1	− 4·9	0·4	0·7
1983-84	− 0·9	− 1·3	2·1	2·2
1979-84	−20·6	−25·7	0·2	3·3

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment, in each of the travel-to-work areas which have newly been given assisted area status, what percentage of employed people work in (a) manufacturing industries and (b) service industries; and what are the corresponding figures for the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information from the September 1981 census of employment is as follows:

Travel-to-work area	Employees in Employment
	Manufacturing industries per cent.	Service industries per cent.
Cinderford and Ross-on-Wye	47	42
Birmingham	37	56
Coventry and Hinckley	46	47
Dudley and Sandwell	49	44
Kidderminster	43	48
Telford and Bridgnorth	38	51
Walsall	45	44
Wolverhampton	41	52
Sheffield	35	55
Blackburn	46	49
Oldham	48	45
Stoke	44	44

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people there were per job vacancy, at the latest date for which figures are available, for each of the travel-to-work areas which have newly been given assisted area status; and what are the corresponding figures for the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: While unemployment totals are available, vacancy figures have not been compiled for the new travel-to-work areas. Moreover, the available statistics of vacancies notified to jobcentres and careers offices only cover a proportion of the total unfilled vacancies.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give figures showing which of the travel-to-work areas newly given assisted area status had their boundaries redrawn for which there was a resultant (a) increase and (b) decrease in the unemployment rate; how large the changes were in each case; and if he will give corresponding figures for the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: Comparable unemployment rates for the old and new travel-to-work areas are not available. The complete map of travel-to-work area boundaries has been revised. The new areas were defined using the latest available data on commuting patterns from the 1981 census of population. They represent the best approximation to a subdivision of the country into separate labour markets for which unemployment rates provide a measure of the local mismatch between labour supply and demand, and as such are the local areas for which the Department publishes unemployment rates.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what percentage of the work force in each of the travel-to-work areas which have newly been given assisted area status have been unemployed for more than (a) one year and (b) two years; and what are the corresponding figures for the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area;

(2) what are the percentages of unemployed people who have been unemployed for more than (a) one year and (b) two years in each of the travel-to-work areas which have newly been given assisted area status; and what are the corresponding figures for the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested in respect of claimants unemployed for more than one year is available in the House of Commons Library. The figures are provisional and include an estimate for those whose claims are not dealt with by computer. Full analysis by duration, including figures for those unemployed for over two years, will not be available for the new travel-to-work areas until next year.

North-West Area

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he forecasts for unemployment trends in the north-west in 1985.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department does not make forecasts of unemployment trends.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Intervention Stores

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide funds for the construction of storage accommodation suitable for storing European Economic Community intervention grain in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: No. I am informed that adequate suitable storage accommodation is already available.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the implications for Northern Ireland public expenditure programmes of the announcement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 12 November.

Mr. Hurd: The autumn statement laid before the House by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 12 November, at column 415, contained a total public expenditure planning total for the Northern Ireland programme of £4,240 million for 1985-86. Because of subsequent technical adjustments the figure now stands at £4,253 million, which is an increase of some £195 million on the forecast outturn for 1984-85 and £30 million on the previously planned total for 1985-86 which underlay the 1984 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9143). As indicated in my right hon. Friend's statement, the figures will continue to be subject to further technical adjustments before publication in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper.

I have decided on the following cash allocations to individual programmes (rounded to the nearest £5 million):

	1985-86 £ million
Agriculture, Fisheries, Food and Forestry	85
Trade, Industry, Energy and Employment	425
Transport	120
Housing	360
Other Environmental Services	165
Law, Order and Protective Services	440
Education, Libraries, Science and Arts	615
Health and Personal Social Services	700
Social Security	1,275
Other Public and Common Services	70
Total	4,255

These planning figures will form the basis for preparation by Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office of Main Estimates for the coming year. These will provide for the detailed allocation to services for which each Department is responsible and will be presented to Parliament in due course.

The allocations reflect my assessment of how best to distribute the Northern Ireland public expenditure total in response to local needs and circumstances. Copies of a more detailed statement on these allocations have been placed in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Subsidies

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated amount of housing subsidies for 1984-85, distinguishing between rate-borne and centrally funded subsidies.

Mr. Gow: Local authorities have claimed £393 million main housing subsidy for 1984-85. Based on their claim forms, it is estimated that net transfers from the general rate fund to the housing revenue account will total £420 million during the year.

Council House Sales

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the assumptions used to estimate the capital receipts to local authorities for 1985-86 in respect of the sale of council dwellings, including the number of sales, the sale price net of discount, the average level of discount and the ratio of private finance.

Mr. Gow: Total local authority housing capital receipts in England in 1985-86 are forecast to be £1,595 million, of which £1,460 million will be from the sale of council dwellings. The detailed forecasts, including the underlying assumptions about council house sales, are as follows:

	£ million cash
Receipts from sales of land	100
Initial receipts from council house sales	890
Repayments of discounts	15
Repayments of sums left outstanding on sales	400
Repayments of loans to private persons	155
Repayment of loans to housing associations	35
Total	1,595

The assumptions about council houses sales on which these forecasts are based are: Number of completed sales, 95,000.

Average selling price, net of discount	£14,400
Average level of discount	40 per cent.
Average level of private finance	65 per cent.

Seaside and Country Homes

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the 3,400 seaside and country homes at present owned by the Greater London council together with the names of the district councils to which it is proposed to transfer them.

Sir George Young: No list of dwellings is held centrally. However, the Library of the House has available the response made by the GLC Conservative group to the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities"; this gives on page 52 the number of dwellings owned by the GLC in 1983 in the area of each district council concerned.

Petrol (Lead Content)

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that unleaded petrol should not be introduced throughout the European Community before 1989.

Mr. Waldegrave: In my statement on 10 December, at column 741, I explained that the Council of Environment Ministers has reached agreement on a directive which provides for the introduction of unleaded petrol throughout the Community not later than 1989, or earlier if individual member states wish. The Government would welcome the sale of unleaded petrol in this country before 1989 if the oil companies see a market for it.

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's Government will support a derogation in the draft directive on lead and benzene content of petrol to allow Italy and France to retain the maximum lead content of 0·4 g per litre.

Mr. Waldegrave: The directive as originally drafted by the European Commission would have acquired the maximum permitted lead content of leaded petrol to be 0·15 grammes per litre from 1 October 1989; but made provision for temporary waivers for member states with particular difficulties. The text as agreed by the Environment Council now requires members states to reduce the lead content of leaded petrol to this level as soon as they consider it appropriate.

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reconsider Her Majesty's Government's decision to reduce the lead content in petrol in the United Kingdom from 0·4 g to 0·15 g from the beginning of 1986.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. This move will reduce petrol-lead emissions by around 60 per cent. immediately; and the Government regard it as an important step towards the eventual elimination of lead from petrol.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer on Monday 19 November, Official Report, column 33, if any of the existing areas of outstanding natural beauty designated by the Countryside Commission in East Anglia have suffered intrusions from commercial development or any other activity.

Mr. Waldegrave: Records are not kept centrally of commercial or other types of development in areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Inner City Partnership Funds

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the totals of inner city partnership funds allotted by authority, distinguishing between funds going to local authorities for their own projects and funds going to the voluntary sector.

Sir George Young: The information is as follows:

1984-85 Inner area

£ million

Partnership authority	Programme allocations	Local authority*	Voluntary sector
Birmingham	24·5	19·11	5·39
Hackney	12·0	6·84	5·16
Islington	10·4	8·22	2·18
Lambeth	13·5	7·42	6·08
Liverpool	24·1	21·69	2·41
Manchester/Salford	24·5	22·05	2·45

Partnership authority	Programme allocations	*Local authority	Voluntary sector
Newcastle/Gateshead	18·0	15·66	2·34
Total	127·0	100·99	26·01

* Including projects involving private sector participation.

Urban Development Grant

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total of urban development grant for 1983-84; and in which local authority areas it was spent.

Sir George Young: In 1983-84 my Department gave final approval to 57 projects worth £87 million comprising £69 million of private investment and £18 million of urban development grant and other public funds. Since then a further 51 projects worth £155 million, involving £124 million of private investment and £31 million of UDG and other public funds, have been approved. Expenditure on these projects will be spread over several years. Another 24 projects worth £108 million, involving £90 million of private investment and £18 million of UDG and other public funds, have received offers of grant to which responses from local authorities remain outstanding.

A list of local authorities with finally approved schemes is below:

Brent
Birmingham
Bolton
Coventry
Dudley
Ealing
Gateshead
Greater London Council
Hackney
Hartlepool
Hull
Islington
Kensington and Chelsea
Knowsley
Lambeth
Leeds
Lewisham
Manchester

Ronan Point

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the records of the public inquiry into the Ronan Point disaster will be available for authorised inspection; what is the period during which they have not been available; and what are the reasons for their non-availability.

Mr. Gow: I understand that access was given to the records of the public inquiry in the period immediately after it reported. When the papers were recovered from storage in order to reply to the hon. Member on 23 October 1984 at columns 553-54 they were found to be in a disordered state and some papers are missing. The task of ordering, securing and cataloguing the papers in order to give the further access which the hon. Member has requested is substantial. The papers should be available for access early in the new year.

Wildlife Inspectorate

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the work of the Wildlife Inspectorate.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am aware that allegations have been made against a part-time voluntary inspector. I understand that these are being investigated by the police, who are receiving every co-operation from my Department. The investigation will not in any way hamper the very effective work done by the Wildlife Inspectorate in monitoring compliance with the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Power Stations (Emissions)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the contribution from emissions from fossil fuel-fired power stations in the United Kingdom to the total acid deposition in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 11 November 1984, c. 446]: The relationship between emissions and deposition can be derived only from mathematical models. On this basis it is estimated that about half of the total acid deposition within the United Kingdom comes from United Kingdom fossil fuel-fired power stations.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the fall in total sulphur dioxide emissions from United Kingdom sources (a) between 1970 and 1980 and (b) from 1980 to date, has been because of reductions in emissions from Central Electricity Generating Board power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 11 November 1984, c. 446]: The information, based on provisional figures for 1983, is as follows:

(a) none
(b) 30 per cent.

DEFENCE

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will reply to the several letters from the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne on a matter originally raised in a letter dated 22 February, and subsequently given his Department's reference D/US of S(AF)DGT/2262.

Mr. Lee: An extensive search has been made for records that might enable me to answer my hon. Friend's inquiry—which relates to the battle of Monte Cassino in 1944—without success so far. Our inquiries will shortly be drawn to a conclusion and my noble Friend will then write to my hon. Friend.

Royal Artillery Range, Hebrides

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any further consultations have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the United States' Government on the use of the royal artillery range, Hebrides, by the United States Army since the visit of the United States Army delegation to the range in 1982.

Mr. Lee: No.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the foreign military units or delegations which have visited the royal artillery range, Hebrides, since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Various foreign units and delegations have visited the royal artillery range, Hebrides, principally in connection with missile sales demonstrations. It has been the practice of successive Governments not to release details of this kind.

Hi-Fix Transmitter Sites (Western Isles)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any plans to instal further Hi-Fix transmitter sites in the Western Isles in addition to those at Ledaig, Scalpay and Uiskevagh.

Mr. Lee: No.

Stornoway Airport

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many air misses have been recorded in the vicinity of Stornoway airport in each year since 1979; and if he will provide a breakdown of these figures into air misses between (a) two civil aircraft, (b) two military aircraft and (c) a civil and a military aircraft.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many practice approaches and practice diversions by military aircraft have been made at Stornoway airport in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Records are not kept in such a way as to allow me to provide this information.

RAF Stornoway

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans exist for military exercises at RAF Stornoway on completion of the current North Atlantic Treaty Organisation redevelopment work there.

Mr. Lee: No firm plans have yet been made. Peacetime exercises at Stornoway will be limited to six weeks in any one year but no timetable has yet been decided.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with represenatives of business and industry about energy saving during the miners' strike.

Mr. Peter Walker: On taking up office I launched a nationwide energy efficiency campaign, including early morning briefings with senior executives. In these I and my fellow Ministers have continued to stress the long-term benefits of switching to coal-firing, despite the damage the strike has done to the prospects of improved markets for coal.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give information on how his Department calculates the amount of plutonium being produced by British nuclear reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: This information is calculated by the operator from the operating records of the reactors.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number and percentage of employees in employment in each of the four main sectors in Dundee in 1975; what are the corresponding figures for the latest available date; and what are the corresponding figures for Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is set out in the table. It is based on the 1968 Standard Industrial Classification.

	Numbers in thousands				Percentages
	Dundee travel-to-work area		Scotland		Dundee travel-to-work area		Scotland

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the percentage of people in the following age groups in Scotland who were economically active in 1979 and at the latest date for men and women (a) 16 to 17, (b) 18 to 24, (c) 25 to 34, (d) 34 to 44, (e) 45 to 54, (f) 55 to 59 and (g) 60 to 64 years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The estimated percentages of the population in Scotland who were economically active in the labour force are set out in the table.

	Males		Females
Age	1979	1983	1979	1983
16 to 24	80·2	81·1	73·1	70·6
25 to 34	95·7	93·4	56·8	57·2
35 to 44	95·5	95·1	68·9	68·6
45 to 59	93·7	88·8	64·8	59·8
60 to 64	74·6	57·6	24·7	19·1

The estimates for the most recent date available relate to 1983 and have been prepared by the Department of Employment. Estimates for the precise age groups requested are not available.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the average length of time an unemployed person has remained on the unemployment register in Dundee and Scotland in 1965, 1980, 1981, 1982, and 1983.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the precise form requested and could be made available for 1965 only at disproportionate cost. However, the following table shows for Dundee jobcentre area and for Scotland the median length of unemployment of:

(a) registrants remaining unemployed at the October count in 1980, 1981 and 1982 and claimants remaining unemployed at the October count in 1983 and 1984; and

(b) claimants who had completed a spell of unemployment during the 12 months up to the October count in 1983 and 1984.

*Median number of weeks unemployed

	Dundee	Scotland
(a) Uncompleted spells of unemployment
Registrants at 9 October 1980	21·2	19·8
Registrants at 8 October 1981	30·9	27·1
Registrants at 14 October 1982	38·6	32·9
Claimants at 13 October 1983	33·2	33·1
Claimants at 11 October 1984	37·4	35·2
(b) Completed spells of unemployment†
12 months ended 13 October 1983	13·5	12·8
12 months ended 11 October 1984	14·1	12·7

* The median length of unemployment is the length of time spent unemployed exceeded by 50 per cent. of those included in the count.

† Median figures for completed spells of unemployment were introduced in August 1983.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the percentage of local authority expenditure for Dundee and Scotland met by central Government funds in each year since 1980-81.

Mr. Ancram: The table sets out the information in the budgets of local authorities based on the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy Publication "Rating Review".

	Dundee District Council	Scotland (All Authorities)
	per cent.	per cent.
1980-81	35·5	57·8
1981-82	28·1	53·6
1982-83	22·3	51·5
1983-84	17·4	49·8
1984-85	18·3	48·8

Notes:

1. For the purpose of this question, local authority expenditure is relevant expenditure for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges, total expenditure on the housing relevant account and rate fund contributions other than to the housing revenue account.

2. Government grants are specific revenue grants, needs and resources elements of rate support grants and housing support grants. In its budget, Dundee assumed no income from housing support grant in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Hospital Waiting Lists (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the numbers currently on the waiting list for treatment at Dundee hospitals; and what have been the average annual figures for each year since 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is not available in precisely the form requested. The following numbers were on waiting lists for Dundee hospitals at 30 September in the years in question—

	Number
1980	3,283
1981	3,383
1982	4,334
1983	5,626

The 1984 numbers are not available centrally. 1982 waiting list data were seriously affected by the industrial dispute and the figure quoted includes an estimate for Ninewells hospital.

School Meals

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the amount of subsidy paid per annum to provide school meals in Scotland; and what proportion is paid to subsidise the cost of midday meals to boarding pupils.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Government does not directly subsidise school meals. However provision for net expenditure by local authorities on school meals of £37·6 million has been included in the relevant expenditure for 1985-86, on which rate support grant is payable. This figure includes provision for midday meals for pupils accommodated in school hostels, but the amount involved cannot be separately identified.

Lothian (Nurses)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current number of qualified nursing staff in the Lothian health board area; what were the corresponding staff figures for 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and how many vacancies currently exist.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of qualified nursing staff in the Lothian health board area were:

At 30 September	Number of qualified staff	Wholetime equivalent
1980	4,842	4,159·7
1981	5,080	4,367·8
1982	5,426	4,683·4
1983	5,568	4,852·6
1984	5,550	*4,859·1

* Provisional.

I understand that there were 120 vacancies at mid-October 1984.

NHS (Privatisation)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has received from the Lothian health board about the privatisation of parts of the National Health Service in Lothian.

Mr. John MacKay: None. I have asked Lothian and other health boards to report in April 1985 what progress they have made in testing the cost-effectiveness of their support services.

Ambulance Staff

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) ambulance staff, (b) police, and (c) fire brigade staff have been (i) assaulted and (ii) admitted to inpatient hospital care, following assaults upon them, in the Strathclyde area, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Ancram: Precise records are not kept. The information available is set out in the table.

Year	Number of assaults			Numbers admitted to in-patient care
	Ambulance staff	Police	Fire Brigade staff	Ambulance staff	Police	Fire Brigade staff
1979	Nil	1,488	Nil	Nil	Information not available	Nil
1980	1	1,633	Nil	Nil		Nil
1981	4	2,106	Nil	Nil		Nil
1982	1	2,168*	3	Nil		Nil
1983	2	*2,175	6	Nil		1

* Includes 1 police officer murdered while on duty.

Police Houses

Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police houses there are in each of the regions of Scotland; and how many have been sold and how many are held vacant in each region.

Mr. Ancram: Information is not readily available in the form requested. I shall reply to my hon. and learned Friend as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East

5. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current peace initiatives in the middle east.

11. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is planning new initiatives in the middle east; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's policy in the middle east.

50. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will press for a European initiative on the middle east.

52. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes to take following his recent visit to the middle east to help towards a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians, particularly regarding the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

56. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes taking to assist in progress toward peace in the middle east.

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends making any fresh proposals designed to resolve the Palestinian issue; and if he will make a statement.

66. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are any plans for a European Economic Community initiative to bring about a comprehensive solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict in the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Heads of State and Government of the European Community reaffirmed in Dublin their desire to see urgent efforts made to establish peace and stability in the middle east, and their willingness to assist efforts to that end. We shall continue to do all we can to encourage negotiated solutions. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister held talks with King Hussein earlier this week, and I discussed the middle east with Mr. Shultz yesterday. But it must be for the parties themselves to take the initiative in peace efforts.

Gulf War

12. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives the European Community is taking to bring about an early end to the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Luce: The European Community wishes to see the earliest possible end to this tragic conflict and believes that the differences between Iran and Iraq must be resolved through dialogue and negotiation. On 4 December leaders of the Ten announced that they would continue to work for an early, just and honourable settlement and would give full support to any efforts to limit the scope of the conflict.

Chemical Weapons

13. Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress there has been in the Geneva negotiations on chemical weapons.

Mr. Luce: Further progress has been made towards a treaty, but more slowly than we would have wished. Key problems of verification remain to be resolved. When the negotiations resume in January we trust that other countries, including the Soviet Union, will join us in showing the flexibility and determination needed to achieve a total ban.

South Africa

14. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the effect on bilateral relations of the failure of the South African Government to return the four South African nationals who failed to answer to their bail at Coventry.

Mr. Rifkind: I strongly condemned the South African Government's action in my statement of 23 October. Their continuing failure to return the four to the United Kingdom is a factor we shall have to take into account in future bilateral dealings.

48. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of United Kingdom—South African relations.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor).

Cyprus

15. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now call upon the United States Government to join Britain in new initiatives with Ankara, following the breakdown of the proximity talks in regard to Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: The proximity talks organised by the United Nations Secretary General have not broken down. We, the United States Government and our allies have given every support to the Secretary General's initiative. We are in constant touch with all the parties to the dispute to that end.

36. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current negotiations in New York on the future of Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: The third round of proximity talks held under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary General, started on 26 November. We have given every support to the Secretary General in his search for a settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Syria

16. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assurances he has received from the Syrian Government that they will assist the international fight to combat terrorism and disband all organisations based in Syria, whose methods include those of terrorism; and what response he has had to any requests he has made to the Syrian Government for co-operation in dealing with terrorism.

Mr. Luce: During my right hon. and learned Friend's visit to Damascus in January, he made clear our views about terrorist activities, as I did in December 1983. The Syrian Government have assured us of their opposition to terrorism.

East-West Relations

17. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of East-West relations.

Mr. Rifkind: We continue to work, with our allies, for a better relationship between East and West. We look forward to discussions later this month with Mr. Gorbachev and to a visit next year by Mr. Gromyko. We welcome signs of a somewhat more forthcoming attitude on the part of the Soviet Union, and in particular the announcement that Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz will meet in Geneva next month. Nevertheless, we recognise that progress on matters of substance is likely to be slow, and that to achieve results will require patience, persistence and realism.

Nicaragua

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to seek to visit Nicaragua in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to visit Nicaragua. He met the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister at the San José conference in September and told him that we strongly support a peaceful settlement of the problems of the region in accordance with the Contadora principles.

23. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: We have normal diplomatic relations with Nicaragua.

28. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to pay an official visit to Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing).

41. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the International Court's decision on United States action in Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: We have taken note of the decisions by the International Court of Justice of 10 May and 26 November 1984.

58. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase the level of United Kingdom diplomatic representation in Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: No.

India

19. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of relations with the Government of India.

37. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to develop Anglo-Indian relations following the assassination of Mrs. Indira Gandhi.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our relations with India are excellent. We shall continue to work closely with the Government of India under their new Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi.

to seek to visit Brazil; and if he will make a statement on current relations between that country and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker).

Ethiopia

43. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to Ethiopia by the Minister for Overseas Development.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The visit to Ethiopia by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development lasted from 25 to 27 November. He had useful discussions with Chairman Mengistu and other members of the Ethiopian Government, and met representatives of the voluntary agencies and international organisations. He visited relief camps at Korem and Mekele and the port of Assab and was impressed by the superb operation of the RAF detachment. Following his visit he announced to the House on 3 December further British assistance to Ethiopia of 15,000 tonnes of cereals, costing about £2·7 million, and other measures to assist relief operations.

65. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Anglo-Ethiopian relations.

Mr. Rifkind: We have normal diplomatic realations with Ethiopia. Over the past 12 months, we have resumed a modest technical co-operation programme and cancelled repayment of certain development loans. (Retrospective Terms Adjustment.) In addition, we have announced £11·3 million of emergency relief and food aid in the past two months, over and above the £15·5 million already allocated since 1982.

Departmental Budget (Overseas Representation)

44. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on that proportion of his Department's budget to be spent on overseas representation for the next financial year; and whether such proportion represents a cut in real or cash terms.

Mr. Renton: Detailed information on the allocation of funds to the overseas representation and other Foreign and Commonwealth Office programmes in 1985-86 will be presented in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper.

Honduras (El Salvadorean Refugees)

45. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has had any discussion with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees about El Salvadorean refugees in Honduras.

Mr. Renton: No. We continue, however, to monitor the refugee situation in Honduras.

Diplomatic Immunity

46. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to seek to renegotiate the Vienna convention on diplomatic immunity.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend intends to make a statement to the House on the review of the vienna convention in due course.

Iraq

49. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the bilateral and international issues raised during the recent visit to Baghdad by the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

53. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Minister of State, during his visit to Iraq, informed the Iraqi Government of Her Majesty's Government's policy of strong abhorrence of terrorism, especially state-sponsored terrorism; and what representations were made by him concerning the implications of this policy for future relations between Iraq and the United Kingdom.

61. Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, during the recent visit to Iraq of the Minister of State, indications were given concerning the release of two British subjects currently serving long prison sentences in that country.

Mr. Luce: A number of subjects were discussed during my visit to Iraq. These included:

Our bilateral political relations, on which it was agreed that there should be a regular dialogue in the future.

The Iran-Iraq conflict, where I made clear our wish to see an early end to the fighting.

The cases of the two British subjects currently serving long prison sentences in Iraq for whom I strongly urged clemency. Unfortunately, I received no assurance that either prisoners would be released in the near future.

Our cultural relations, with particular reference to the good work of the British Council in Baghdad.

Our commercial relations, in the light of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade's earlier visit.

I also reiterated our strong condemnation of terrorism. For their part, the Iraqi authorities declared that they were firmly against terrorist actions.

El Salvador

51. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to pay an official visit to El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to visit El Salvador.

Soviet Union (Foreign Minister's Visit)

54. Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if a date has yet been fixed for the planned visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister to Great Britain.

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Gromyko has accepted my right hon. and learned Friend's invitation to him to come to the United Kingdom next year. Dates are still under discussion.

Gibraltar

57. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of the agreement reached between Her Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government on 27 November on the removal of all restrictions at present in existence between Gibraltar and Spain, the restrictions will be lifted progressively in the near future or will all be removed on 15 February 1985.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our agreement with the Spanish Government announced on 27 November envisages the establishment of the free movement of persons, vehicles and goods between Gibraltar and the neighbouring territory not later than February 1985. This does not rule out action before that date.

70. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the negotiations he has been having with the Spanish Foreign Minister as to Gibraltar.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made in the House on 28 November.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Spanish building contractors will be permitted to compete for work in Gibraltar using their own labour and equipment as a result of the Brussels agreement.

Mr. Renton: Under the Brussels agreement, Spanish labour working for an employer would remain subject to prior national authorisation; that is, the Gibraltar work permit regime. Subject to the terms of proposals to be introduced in the Legislature of Gibraltar, self-employed Spanish contractors would be entitled to compete for work in Gibraltar on the same basis as other European Community nationals.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the right of residence being granted to Spanish nationals under the Brussels agreement will qualify them for the right to apply for inclusion on the Government housing waiting list.

Mr. Renton: The allocation of Government housing in Gibraltar is a matter for the Gibraltar Government under the housing allocations scheme.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Moroccan nationals made redundant by the naval dockyard will have priority of employment over Spanish nationals in the commercial dockyard.

Mr. Renton: The selection of employees in the commercial dockyard is a matter for judgment by the employers.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Spain will permit the reintroduction of a Gibraltar — Madrid flight on the lifting of restrictions.

Mr. Renton: The question of air services between Spain and Gibraltar is governed by the 1950 air services agreement between the United Kingdom and Spain. Aviation will, of course, also be among the matters discussed in the negotiations envisaged by the Lisbon declaration.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there will be a ferry service between Gibraltar and Algeciras on the lifting of restrictions

Mr. Renton: The Lisbon declaration envisages the re-establishment of direct communications in the region of Gibraltar. The nature of the services to provide such communication will be a matter for the commercial operators concerned.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Spain has indicated that it expects to obtain landing rights at Gibraltar for Iberia Airlines as a result of the Brussels agreement.

Mr. Renton: We have received no communication on this subject from the Spanish Government.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Spanish nationals will be free to use Gibraltar medical services on the same terms as visiting European Economic Community nationals.

Mr. Renton: On implememtation of the Lisbon declaration, emergency medical assistance would be provided in Gibraltar to visiting Spaniards as to visiting European Community nationals.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether persons providing cross-frontier services will be liable to income tax in Gibraltar if they are paid for their services in Spain.

Mr. Renton: The tax system in Gibraltar is a matter for the Gibraltar Government. The rules for the charging of tax when two countries are involved are often complex, and only the authorities concerned could express a view.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Spanish nationals in employment in Gibraltar will be able to claim family allowances in respect of dependent children living in Spain on the implementation of the Brussels agreement; and if the same rights will be granted to Moroccan nationals at the same time.

Mr. Renton: The question of the payment of family allowances to Spanish nationals employed in Gibraltar remains subject to the proposals for legislation to be introduced into the Gibraltar Legislature on the advance implementation of the European Community rights in accordance with the Brussels agreement. In principle, Spanish nationals employed in Gibraltar would not be entitled to claim family allowances for children who are not resident with them in Gibraltar. The position of Moroccan nationals will be unchanged.

Namibia

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made in implementing United Nations resolution 435 in relation to the future of Namibia,

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of talks on Namibia.

Mr. Rifkind: The Angolan and South African Governments have now put forward separate proposals on the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola. The United States is discussing these with both parties in an effort to help achieve an agreement which would enable implementation of Security Council resolution 435. This process offers the best prospect for early Namibia independence.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support proposals on Namibia made by the Angolan President in his letter to the United Nations Secretary General of 20 November.

Mr. Rifkind: We welcome any move which will bring a Namibia settlement closer. The South African Government have also made proposals on Cuban withdrawal. Negotiations are continuing. We much hope that the parties concerned can reach an early agreement.

Guatemala

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit Guatemala.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Disarmament Talks

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current disarmament talks and prospects for the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics ministerial meeting in January 1985.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone).

We remain anxious to make progress towards agreements in the current negotiations in Stockholm, Vienna and Geneva and will continue to make an active and positive contribution to that end.

72. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the mutual and balanced force reduction talks at Vienna.

Mr. Luce: In the latest round—27 September to 13 December—of the mutual and balanced force reduction talks, the West has continued to promote the initiative it tabled in April which offers a real opportunity to resolve the long-standing dispute over the size of Eastern forces. The East's response is still very negative. It maintains that each side should determine for itself the size of reductions necessary to reach the agreed common ceiling of 900,000 ground and air forces on each side.

Chile

67. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to review British relationships with Chile in the light of developments within that country.

69. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what effect the state of seige in Chile will have on British relations with that country.

Mr. Renton: We continue to review the situation in Chile so as to ensure that our relations with that country properly reflect both our concerns and our interests there.

Human Rights

68. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment he has made of the Soviet Union's adherence to the human rights articles of the Helsinki agreement.

Mr. Rifkind: Our most recent assessment is contained in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) on 17 July. I regret to say that there have been no signs of any general improvement in the Soviet Union's compliance with the provisions of the Helsinki final act since then, though we welcome the decision to grant exit visas in three cases raised by my right hon. and learned Friend in Moscow last July.

Poland

71. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of Anglo-Polish relations.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 14 November. My recent visit to Poland marked the successful resumption of United Kingdom-Polish contacts at ministerial level.

Our aim now is to work for a more normal bilateral relationship and to encourage the much needed process of reconciliation in that country.

United Kingdom-Polish commercial relations are developing satisfactorily. The United Kingdom-Polish joint commission for economic, industrial, scientific and technological co-operation resumed its work with a meeting in Warsaw in October.

UNESCO

75. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States Government about the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: The Government have kept in regular touch with the United States Government about UNESCO.

76. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the scientific implications of any decision by Her Majesty's Government to withdraw from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: Before taking the decision to give notice, we consulted interested bodies, including the Natural Sciences Advisory Committee of the United Kingdom National Commission for UNESCO, the Royal Society and Government Departments. This consultation will continue and all the views will be taken into account before a final decision is made after the 1985 general conference.

77. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries of the Commonwealth and the European Community have made representations to Her Majesty's Government against the United Kingdom giving notice of leaving the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) on 29 November, exchanges between Governments are confidential. We have been in touch with a number of Community and Commonwealth Governments since the announcement of our intention to submit formal notice of withdrawal this year. Some have expressed regret, but most of these have said that they understood our position.

Argentina

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what talks are currently in progress with the Government of Argentina.

Mr. Renton: None. We are not prepared to negotiate on sovereignty over the Falkland Islands. But we remain ready to talk about practical ways of improving bilateral relations with Argentina, as we had hoped to do during the talks in Berne in July. These talks regrettably ended in deadlock because the Argentines, contrary to what had been agreed, insisted on linking discussion of the normalisation of relations with discussion of sovereignty. This remains their position.

UMELCO Delegation (London Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the scope and purpose of the recent visit from Hong Kong of the UMELCO delegation to London.

Mr. Luce: A delegation representing the Unofficial Members of the Executive and Legislative Councils of Hong Kong, led by Sir S. Y. Chung, arrived in London on 1 December. During their stay, the delegation had meetings with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and myself, when they explained the view of the people of Hong Kong on the draft agreement on the future of Hong Kong. They also attended the debate on the draft agreement in the House of Commons on 5 December. Some members of the delegation attended the debate on the draft agreement in the House of Lords on 10 December.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of the recent visit of UMELCO members to London; and if Her Majesty's Government or the Hong Kong Government will bear the cost.

Mr. Luce: The estimated cost of the recent visit of Unofficial Members of the Executive Council and Legislation Councils — UMELCO — to London is approximately Hong Kong $500,000 — approximately £52,600. This will be met by the Hong Kong Legislative Council from the public funds appropriated each year for the expenses of the UMELCO office.

Decade for Women Conference, Nairobi

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who will be representing the United Kingdom at the United Nations conference on the decade for women in Nairobi in July of next year.

Mr. Renton: The composition of the United Kingdom delegation to this conference has not yet been decided. It is likely to be similar to that of our delegations to the two previous conferences of the United Nations decade for women.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the estimated cost of sending the United Kingdom delegation to the forthcoming Nairobi conference on the United Nations decade for women.

Mr. Renton: It is too early to be able to give the information sought by my hon. Friend. The cost of the British delegation will depend on its composition, which has still to be decided.

Discrimination Against Women Convention

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received objecting to the ratification by the United Kingdom of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Renton: We have received 13 such representations this year from private individuals, Members of Parliament and members of interested organisations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amendments he would consider essential to the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women before it would be ratified by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: States cannot seek amendments to the convention before ratifying it, but they may enter reservations and make interpretative declarations upon ratification.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report those organisations with which his Department has discussed the possible ratification of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Renton: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received, and taken into account, representations from a wide range of non-governmental organisations, including, during the last year, the National Council of Women of Great Britain, the British Federation of University Women, Change, the Responsible Society and the Family and Child Protection Group.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from religious organisations concerning those aspects of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women which would affect the conduct of such organisations.

Mr. Renton: We have not received representations from religious organisations. We have informed individuals who have inquired about this aspect that the reservations we would enter upon ratification would cover the affairs of religous ministries.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has concerning the effects upon domestic legislation of ratification of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women in those English-speaking nations which have already ratified it.

Mr. Renton: The Austrialian Government introduced the Sex Discrimination Act following ratification of the convention. One of the Act's stated objects is to give effect to certain provisions of the convention. The Canadian Government have recently been reviewing their legislation on equality. The convention's provisions have been borne in mind during this process.

Hong Kong

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about the introduction of direct elections in Hong Kong prior to 1997.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Hong Kong Government White Paper, published on 21 November, set out arrangements for the indirect election of 24 Members of the Legislative Council which will be introduced in 1985. There will be a review in 1987 which will cover matters such as the introduction of direct elections.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Environment

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will give a date for the publication of a Green Paper on agriculture and the environment.

Mr. Jopling: I am considering whether to publish a statement of the Government's views on future agricultural and food policy, including environmental aspects.

Agricultural Buildings (Asbestos)

Mr. George asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to cease subsidising the construction of buildings on agricultural land with asbestos roofing.

Mrs. Fenner: The Health and Safety Executive has published guidelines for the safe handling of asbestos material in building work. We have therefore no plans to disallow its eligibility for grant.

Pesticides

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what speaking engagements either he or others in his Department have undertaken or are proposing to undertake at meetings or conferences, dinners or luncheons, arranged by, or with organisations concerned with, production, marketing or use of pesticides in 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: I and my officials are in regular contact with organisations concerned with the production, marketing and use of pesticides, through all the means mentioned. My concern extends well beyond those organisations with a direct financial interest in pesticides.

Council of Ministers (Meeting)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Ministers of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food held in Brussels on 11 December.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement which I made earlier today.

Grain Stocks

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the level of grain stocks held by the European Economic Community under the intervention policies of the common agricultural policy on 1 January; and what has been the increase in those stocks for each month since 1 January.

Mr. MacGregor: The following table shows the EEC's intervention stocks of cereals on the first day of each month since 1 January 1984:

	Million tonnes
January	8·92
February	7·80
March	6·96
April	5·71

TRANSPORT

Seafarers (Health and Safety)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what resources were provided to the section of his Department responsible for the occupational health and safety of seafarers for each of the financial years since 1978-79 expressed in cash and in constant prices.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information is not fully available, but the costs would include providing the following services:

In addition to the direct and the general costs incurred by the staff mentioned in my answer to the hon. Member on Tuesday 11 December, at columns 407-8, my Department bears the costs of : enforcing legislation, various occupational health and safety publications issued free of charge to seafarers or to masters or shipowners; the collection and analysis of accident data; certain research projects; and various other activities, including a number associated with enforcing legislation.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether his Department is able to estimate the change in traffic volume for the A206 if the east London river crossing is constructed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether his Department is able to estimate the change in traffic volume for the A2016 if the east London river crossing is constructed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether the current proposals for the east London river crossing include a location for an interchange between that road and the A2016; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether the current proposals for the east London river crossing include a location for an interchange between that road and the A206; and if will make a statement;

(5) whether any consultation has taken place between his Department and the London borough of Bexley concerning the east London river crossing; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The traffic data for the east London river crossing, including that on the A206 and A2016, are currently being updated and I shall let my hon. Friend have the relevant figures when these are available early next year. The proposals provide for an interchange with the A2016, but not with the A206. The London borough of Bexley has been fully consulted about the proposals and has attended presentations on them, and has had a number of discussions with my Department.

Railway Investment

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Transport how railway investment approved by Her Majesty's Government since 1979 north of Manchester compares with that elsewhere in England.

Mr. David Mitchell: Of the 16 major railway investment projects approved by Government since 1979, six relate wholly or partly to the area north of Manchester. In addition, BR itself has authorised other investment projects in that area which did not require our approval.

A1 (Improvements)

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further plans he has to improve the English section of the A1.

Mrs. Chalker: "Policy for Roads in England 1983" (Cmnd. 9059) shows the major improvements intended for the A1 (including the Newcastle western bypass and other improvements on the A69). It also shows that we are undertaking a study of further needs of the road between Dishforth and Scotch Corner in north Yorkshire.

Radar Station (Tiree)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the function of the new radar station under construction on Tiree.

Mr. Ridley: The Tiree radar is part of the National Air Traffic Services' programme to improve and modernise radar facilities in the United Kingdom. It replaces outdated equipment located elsewhere. The new station will improve the coverage of radar used for control of air traffic over Scotland and in the western approaches.

Cycle Lanes

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider recommending the conversion of some bus lanes into partial cycle lanes, with the remaining areas reverting to car lanes.

Mrs. Chalker: Bus lanes can normally be used by cyclists. Whether they should be installed or retained should depend on whether they provide a net benefit to the community.

Motorways (Lighting)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the likely reduction in accidents that would occur on unlit sections of motorways if they were lit.

Mrs. Chalker: Research results show the reduction in casualty accidents to be extremely variable. Further studies are in hand to try and improve the information.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of lighting (a) the remaining stretches of the M1 and (b) all other stretches of the motorway network.

Mrs. Chalker: The estimated cost (at 1982-83 prices) of lighting the unlit lengths of the M1 and all other stretches of the motorway network are £9 million and £81 million respectively.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the completion of lighting between the Newport Pagnell service centre and junction 16 of the M1; and whether he has any plans to provide additional lighting on the remaining unlit stretches of the M1.

Mrs. Chalker: The installation of lighting on the M1 motorway between Newport Pagnell service area and junction 16 will be done in phases to accord with the programme for other roadworks and should be completed by spring 1987.

I am keeping under review the need to provide additional lighting on the remaining unlit stretches of the M1.

Civil Aviation Authority

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to introduce quantified non-financial objectives for the Civil Aviation Authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The agreement of objectives, both financial and non-financial, is a fundamental part of the Department's discussion with the Civil Aviation Authority of its corporate plan. Discussions on the 1985 corporate plan are to begin very shortly and I hope that as a result of these it will be possible to agree more quantified objectives. However, the agreement of a full set of quantified objectives will have to await the completion of the authority's work on performance indicators.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last discussed with the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority the authority's response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the national air traffic services.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority has kept me and my officials in touch with the progress made in following up the commission's recommendations and the chairman and I discussed this when we met on 4 October. I expect to make a statement on this shortly.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the main objectives in the current corporate plan of the Civil Aviation Authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The primary objectives of the authority stem from its statutory duties and are:

—to promote high safety standards in civil aviation by information, consultation and judicious administration of safety regulations;

—to maintain and develop, in association with the Ministry of Defence, an efficient national air traffic system geared to the requirements of the users;

—in carrying out its air transport licensing functions, and in related activities, to impose the minimum of constraint consistent with the promotion of high safety standards, the interests of air travellers and the economic health of the industry.

In pursuing its primary objectives the authority will have regard to the importance of strict control of costs so as to contain, and where possible reduce, its charges to those it regulates and serves.

A fuller summary of the 1984 corporate plan may be found in appendix 2 of the CAA's annual report and accounts 1983-84, a copy of which is available in the Library.

M25 (Accident)

Mr. Howard asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has anything to add to the information given by his hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) about the accident on the M25 on 11 December.

Mrs. Chalker: The latest information available to me is that it is hoped to open both carriageways tomorrow morning, Thursday. Repairs are being carried out overnight.

Yesterday I said that a 30 mph limit had been in operation for all vehicles throughout the night. I made this statement on the information available to me at the time, but I am sorry to say that I have since learnt that this was not the case. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has called for full reports from the chief constables of Kent and Surrey. When these have been received, consideration will be given to what further action may be required. I repeat my assurance that my Department will examine all the data, using all relevant resources, to see what we can learn from this terrible tragedy.

Trinity House Lighthouse Board

Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the Trinity House Lighthouse Board.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond is the general lighthouse authority for England and Wales. The day-to-day management is undertaken by a subordinate, non-statutory body, the Trinity House Lighthouse Board, the members of which up to now have been drawn from the Elder Brethren and their senior staff.

The Public Accounts Committee, in its twenty-ninth report for the session 1981-82 (HC 438), dealing with the general lighthouse fund, said it found it anomalous that the Department has no power to appoint the lighthouse authorities, despite its specific responsibility for the fund and its general responsibility for marine safety.

In view of those observations, and with close regard to the work that has been done in pursuing them, I am glad to say that Trinity House has responded constructively and decided to restructure the Lighthouse Board so that, under the chairmanship of the deputy master, Sir Miles Wingate, it will in future consist of four further Elder Brethren and four nominees of the Secretary of State, as voting members, with three senior Trinity House officials as non-voting members.

My right hon. Friend warmly welcomes this initiative; he is particularly concerned that the notable marine skills of Trinity House should be augmented from the financial and business world, and accordingly has invited the corporation to appoint to the board Sir Michael Colman, finance director of Reckitt and Colman Limited; Mr. Lester George, a director of Ferranti plc; Rear Admiral Hubert Hollins, CB, formerly general manager of the Middle East Navigation Aids Service; and Mr. William Thomson, the chairman of the Forth Ports Authority.

TRANSPORT

GLC (Lorry Ban)

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will now take steps to set up a public inquiry into the Greater London council's proposed lorry ban; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Following the decision by the GLC's transport committee today in favour of implementation of its night-time and weekend lorry ban proposals; I am formally consulting the council under schedule 9 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984.

In the letter of consultation I am making it clear to the GLC that I am disposed to think that the duty of the GLC under section 122 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 is not being satisfactorily discharged. Because of this, I am minded to issue a direction to the council prohibiting it from making (or if made, from bringing into effect) the order for this scheme without my consent.

If I do give such a direction, it would then be my intention to establish a public inquiry into the GLC's proposals, and the objections duly made to them. I would then determine whether to give or to withhold my consent to the order in the light of the findings of that inquiry.

The GLC is being given until 20 December to provide me with its formal views.

My objective is to ensure that, given the potentially far-reaching effects of the GLC's proposals on the movement of traffic, particularly commercial traffic, those proposals and the thousands of objections duly lodged to them are fully and impartially examined at public inquiry. An inquiry would provide an independent assessment of the environmental benefits of the GLC's proposals and their disadvantages to the movement of traffic.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pesticides

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give figures for the numbers of people aged 0 to 4, 5 to 11, 12 to 20, 21 to 60 and over 60 years poisoned by pesticides in each of the years from 1970 to 1984.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available in the exact form requested. The tables give the numbers of deaths in England and Wales in the available age groups from 1970 to 1983 attributed to accidental poisoning and the estimated number of discharges (excluding deaths) from National Health Service hospitals following treatment for poisoning by pesticides from 1970 to 1982. The sample information held centrally in the latter is too small for reliable estimates to be made of the number of discharges in the older age groups. The figures for hospital discharges do not distinguish whether administration was accidental or due to self-administration.

Electorate (Statistics)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the shire counties, London boroughs and metropolitan boroughs in England in ranking order according to the degree by which their electorates vary from the nationally averaged electorate appropriate to the number of parliamentary constituencies within them.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table.

Single Payments (Gas Appliances)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will instruct his Department's local officers to authorise single payments for the purchase of gas appliances bought only from approved dealers and to instruct them positively to discourage claimants from purchasing such items from non-approved dealers.

Mr. Whitney: Single payments for gas appliances are intended to meet the cost of reconditioned items if these are available and of new items if they are not. We believe it right that our claimants should have the freedom to locate reasonably priced items of their own choice, and we would not wish to introduce a general restriction on where claimants should spend their single payments. However, our guidance (in paragraph 7214(2) of the S manual—a copy of which is in the Library) tells local office staff that, where a reconditioned item is to be provided for, the claimant should be advised to obtain one that has been checked and will be installed by a suitably qualified person.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the effects upon the pharmaceutical industry of the Government's decision to introduce a limited list of generic drugs for the treatment of certain therapeutic conditions under the National Health Service.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has sent to the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry in answer to its representations on the effects of limited drugs prescription on investments, production and exports within the sphere of the pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend on 10 December, at column 384.

Homeless Households

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households in London are in receipt of board and lodging allowance for accommodation in bed and breakfast hotels; and if he will provide the information for people aged (a) up to 25 years, (b) 25 to 40 years and (c) over 40 years, giving the average and the total amount of such benefits paid.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Estimated numbers of boarders in ordinary board and lodging accommodation and hostels and common lodging houses for December 1982, the latest date for which reliable estimates are available, are as follows:

Estimated number of Boarders in Greater London Council area 1982

	Thousands
Over Pension Age	2·5
Unemployed under 25	3·3
Unemployed over 25	7·4
All other allowance cases	2·5

Source: "Annual Statistical Enquiry".

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households are in receipt of supplementary benefit housing addition payments for mortgage interest in (a) London and (b) Great Britain.

Mr. Whitney: Provisional estimates for December 1983* indicate that in some 250,000 cases in Great Britain an amount for mortgage interest was included in the supplementary benefit assessment.

Separate estimates for London are not available.

* The latest date for which information is available.

Source: "Annual Statistical Enquiry".

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated total for 1984-85 of mortgage interest paid for recipients of supplementary benefits.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that an estimate for 1984-85 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 22 October to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle), at columns 510-11, which gives the latest available information.

Family Incomes

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number and percentage of households in Scotland at the latest available date whose incomes were (a) below supplementary benefit level, (b) at a level eligible for supplementary benefit and (c) at or up to 40 per cent. above supplementary benefit level; and what were the corresponding figures for May 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available information relates to estimates of numbers of families and single people on low incomes in 1981. These estimates and those for 1979 represent the average over each year and are shown in the table. The assumptions on which the estimates are based are those used and described in a set of tables entitled "Low Income Families — 1981", a copy of which is lodged in the Library.

Families and Single People in Scotland with Income at Specific Levels.

	Below supplementary benefit level		In receipt of supplementary benefit		Above supplementary benefit level but less than 40 per cent. above
	1981	1979	1981	1979	1981	1979
Estimated number of families and single people (thousands)	110	110	300	260	400	270
Percentage of all families in Scotland	4	5	12	11	16	11

Note:

The figures for 1979 and 1981 are not strictly comparable because of changes in the rules relating to heating additions.

Health Authorities (Strategic Plans)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the timetable allowed to district health authorities to prepare their strategic plans.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The amount of time allowed to districts is a matter for regional authorities to decide upon. I am not aware of any existing general problem. If the hon. Member has a particular instance in mind he should write to the chairman of the appropriate regional health authority.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what representations he has received regarding the timetable arranged for the submission of strategic plans by regional health authorities;

(2) if he will extend the timetable for submission of strategic plans by the regional health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have held discussions with regional health authorities where they have told us they may have a problem in meeting the deadline for submission. As a result, it has been agreed that five regions may submit their plans after the original deadline. Two regions have already submitted their strategic plans and the remaining regions are still working to the original deadline of 31 March 1985. We have not received any other representations on this matter.

Doctors (Prescription Forms)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to curb the incidence of doctors issuing pre-signed blank prescription forms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 7 December, at column 315.

Blond McIndoe Centre (Exhibition)

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Blond McIndoe Centre to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am very pleased to confirm that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 17 to 21 December.

Ambulance Staff

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many ambulance staff have been admitted to inpatient hospital care, following assaults on them in the Greater London area in each of the last five years;

(2) how many ambulance staff have been (a) assaulted and (b) admitted to inpatient care in hospital, following assault, in each of the metropolitan counties in each of the last five years;

(3) how many assaults there have been on ambulance men in each of the last five years in the Greater London area.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority, which is responsible for the management of the London Ambulance Service.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what terms and conditions apply to ambulance staff who are unable to work, following injuries received while at work.

Mr. John Patten: An agreement of the ambulancemen's Whitley Council provides for payment equivalent to full pay for up to six months, followed by half pay for up to a further six months. There are additional provisions applying to all Health Service employees who are absent on reduced or no pay because of an injury or whose earning ability is permanently reduced.

Doctors and Nurses

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the ratio of nurses to patients in National Health Service hospitals in 1970, 1975 and 1980 and at the latest available date;

(2) what was the ratio of doctors to patients in National Health Service hospitals in the years 1970, 1975 and 1980 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 23 November 1984, c.326]: I do not consider that meaningful ratios of the type requested can be produced. Manpower statistics cover staff working in hospitals and are collected at a particular point in time; but they do not show what activities within the hospital the staff are engaged upon —for example, whether they are providing treatment to inpatients, outpatients or accident and emergency patients. By contrast, activity statistics show the number of cases treated during the year in NHS hospitals divided into day cases, inpatient and outpatient cases (including accident and emergency cases). Any overall staff-patient ratio is an extremely crude measure both for these reasons and because it does not take into account varying factors such as age of patients and type or complexity of treatment given.

Relevant information on manpower and activity for 1970, 1975 and 1980 and 1983 (the latest available date) is given in the tables.

NHS Hospitals in England: activity during the year

	1970	†1975	1980	1983
Inpatient discharges and deaths	5,011,713	4,975,750	5,670,001	6,018,585
Day case attendances	*N/A	421,698	670,794	813,218
Total outpatient attendances	32,354,802	30,947,482	35,242,980	36,519,550
Total Accident and Emergency attendances	13,321,653	12,791,720	13,052,622	13,603,075

* Day case figures not collected separately before 1972
† Activity levels in 1975 were affected by industrial action in the health service.

Staffing in NHS Hospitals in England at 30 September (whole-time equivalents)

	1970	1975	1980	1983
*Medical and Dental staff	23,692	29,752	34,732	36,628
†‡Nursing and Midwifery Staff	240,080	304,510	330,170	350,560

* Includes hospital practitioners, clinical assistants and locums
† Includes all agency staff: in 1983 around 2 per cent. of these were employed in the community but it is not possible to separate these from hospital staff for all the years requested.
‡ Not adjusted for the reduction in working hours in 1980 (from 40 to 37½ hours per week).

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has anything to add to his reply of 30 October, Official Report, column 959, about housing benefit high rent schemes.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984, c. 79]: I now understand that the hon. Member is referring to my reply of 30 October, at columns 957-59, in which I listed those local authorities which, on the information available to the Department, would have qualified for high rent scheme authorisations but had not applied at that time. My reply needs to be revised to take account of fresh information about some of the authorities listed and to correct certain errors, as follows:

Ashford would qualify for authorisation for council tenants as well as private tenants;

Castle Point, Havering, Isle of Wight and Peterborough development corporation were listed as qualifying for authorisation for council tenants, but do not do so;

Dover and Wokingham were listed as qualifying for authorisation for private tenants, but do not do so.

Racism (Nursery Schools)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take on the report by his Department on racism in nursery schools and playgrounds.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 381]: I assume that the question refers to the recently published report on provision for under-fives from ethnic minority communities, copies of which are in the Library. The report, which is not about racism, was commissioned by the inter-departmental consultative group on provision for under-fives, jointly with representatives of the local authority associations, the National Association of Health Authorities, and voluntary organisations working in the under-fives field. The commissioning bodies decided that the report should be made widely available without charge, which has been arranged by the Department, and that there should be a series of regional seminars further to disseminate the report's recommendations. The National Council of Voluntary Child Care Organisations has agreed to make arrangements for such seminars next year, with some financial support from this Department.

Northern Ireland

20. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet the Irish Foreign Secretary to discuss further the future of Northern Ireland.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I frequently meet the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic during EC meetings and discuss with him matters of mutual concern. These from time to time include aspects of the situation in Northern Ireland.

Arms Control

21. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he is considering in the various areas of arms control.

22. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiative Her Majesty's Government are taking to stimulate talks to achieve mutual, balanced and verifiable arms reductions.

Mr. Luce: We are strongly committed to the pursuit of arms control agreements. We have already, with our allies, put many proposals on the negotiating table in Stockholm, Vienna and Geneva. We will continue to pursue proposals which make a practical contribution to progress in arms control; and to support the United States in its search for agreements with the Soviet Union at the bilateral talks which resume in Geneva on 7 January.

27. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role he expects the United Kingdom to play in the Geneva discussions on arms control in January.

Mr. Luce: We will continue to maintain close consultations with the United States and its other allies on the whole range of arms control matters, including those relating to nuclear and space questions. We hope the meeting between Mr. Shultz and Mr. Gromyko in Geneva will lead to agreement on how to carry forward negotiations on these matters. The negotiations will, of course, be bilateral.

UDF Activists (Durban)

24. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will allow visits by lawyers representing the three UDF activists in the British consulate in Durban to obtain instructions for their appeals to the South African Supreme Court.

47. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now permit family and solicitor visits to the three men currently in occupation of the British consulate in Durban.

Mr. Rifkind: Our main objective must be to resolve this difficult problem. We are therefore prepared to consider a visit by the three men's lawyers if its purpose would be to contribute to the early departure of the three men from the consulate.

BBC (External Services)

25. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the allocation from his Department's budget for 1985-86 to the external services of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and if he will indicate the criteria which he has applied in determining that figure.

Mr. Renton: The total allocation for external broadcasting for 1985-86 will be approximately £110 million. This sum includes the cost of relay stations operated by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on behalf of the BBC external services.

This amount has been arrived at on the basis of the planned expenditure on the 10-year audibility programme announced in 1981 and estimated running costs of the broadcasting services prescribed by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, taking into account the financial resources available to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

73. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received since 22 November on the future of the external services of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Renton: We have received no formal representations on this subject, but we are aware of the concern in the House and among the public that the British Broadcasting Corporation's level of broadcasting should be maintained.

74. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to act on the findings of the report he has recently received on the efficiency and effectiveness of the British Broadcasting Corporation external services.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add at this stage to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) on 16 November.

Central America (Contadora Process)

26. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's contribution to the Contadora process in Central America.

Mr. Renton: As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 9 November, we together with our European partners, are giving our wholehearted support to the Contadora process. The presence of my right hon. and learned Friend at the San José meeting in September underlined our determination to support that process.

59. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Governments of Mexico, Panama, Columbia and Venezuela about the future of the Contadora talks.

Mr. Renton: We strongly support a peaceful solution to the problems of Central America in accordance with the Contadora process. My right hon. and learned Friend was able to make this clear to the Foreign Ministers of the Governments listed above at the San José meeting in September.

Honduras and Nicaragua

29. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British doplomats there are in Honduras and Nicaragua at present.

Mr. Luce: There are three United Kingdom based staff in Honduras and one in Nicaragua.

Law of the Sea Convention

30. Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received about the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the United Nations law of the sea convention.

Mr. Rifkind: We have received representations from a number of Governments, including those of some European and Commonwealth countries, and from various private organisations and individuals in the United Kingdom.

55. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the terms and conditions upon which Her Majesty's Government will continue their participation in the development of the United Nation's convention on the law of the sea.

Mr. Rifkind: I draw the attention of the hon. Member to the statement I made during the Adjournment debate on the law of the sea convention last Thursday, 6 December. We remain entitled to be observers at the Preparatory Commission.

Belize

31. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for Her Majesty's Government's defence responsibilities in Belize of the presence of United States service men in Honduras.

Mr. Renton: The British presence in Belize is in no way related to the presence of United States service men in the region. British troops are in Belize at the request of the Belizean Government to assist that country in its external defence. They are not involved in any other Central American country.

Privatisation (Departmental Savings)

32. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Renton: The privatisation of the hydraulic research station of the Department of the Environment in 1982 will result in estimated savings of some £80,000 to the Overseas Development Administration in 1984-85.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is also contracting out some cleaning services and this will be extended at the end of this financial year. This will result in savings in the long term. The Department will also be considering whether there are any other areas of work, including travel and canteen services in the Overseas Development Administration, which can be put out to contract.

Falkland Islands (Peruvian Peace Proposals)

33. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what day and at what time his Department first received indications of Peruvian peace proposals in May 1982.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister stated in paragraph 15 of the annex to her letter of 19 September to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), which was published in the Official Report on 29 October at columns 788-91,

"as has been frequently made clear the first indications of these proposals did not reach London from Washington until 11.15 pm London time on 2 May—over three hours after the attack on the Belgrano—and from Lima until 2 am London time on 3 May".

Islamic States (Religious Freedom)

34. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to Governments of middle eastern Islamic states, such as Saudi Arabia, regarding the right of Christians living or working in those countries to celebrate religious services, especially at Christmas time; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: None. The difficulty is not a widespread one, but we are, of course, concerned that British subjects in all countries should be able to worship in private groups in accordance with their conscience at Christmas as at other times. In places where problems may occur, the embassy monitors the situation closely in consultation with concerned members of the British community, and endeavours to ensure that suitable arrangements for worship are made.

Mr. Abu Nidal

35. Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information Her Majesty's Government have as to whether Mr. Abu Nidal is still alive.

Mr. Luce: We have seen several reports that Abu Nidal has died, but others claiming that he is still alive. It is not possible to judge which version is correct.

Soviet Union

39. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans his Department has for discussions with the members of the delegation of the Supreme Soviet, which is shortly to visit Britain as the guests of the British Group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend will be having talks with the leader of the delegation, Mr. Gorbachev, during his visit.

Space Weapons

40. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proposed negotiations on space weapons between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks.)

Brazil

42. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans

The Prime Minister: With the agreement of the Secretary of State for Social Services, I have approved the appointment of Mr. Victor Paige, CBE, to the post of chairman of the NHS management board. Mr. Paige will take up this new post, which carries the rank of second permanent secretary in the Department of Health and Social Security, on a three-year contract beginning 1 January 1985.

Soil Survey

Mr. Lilley asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy that the funding of the "Soil Survey of England and Wales" should be shared between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Department of Education and Science and the Department of the Environment.

The Prime Minister: No. The Soil Survey of England and Wales, although forming part of the Agricultural and Food Research Council organisation, has, since 1973-74, been funded by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. At present my right hon. Friend is reviewing the level of funding by his Ministry.

WALES

Primary Schools (Welsh Units)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the Welsh units in primary schools in Wales, by county, and indicate which of these are in schools with monoglot English head-teachers.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: This information is not available.

Education (Welsh Language)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the linguistic effects of the establishment of (a) bilingual classes in English medium schools and (b) Welsh medium primary schools.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am satisfied that pupils can recieve a satisfactory Welsh medium education in both bilingual classes and in Welsh medium schools.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department has made any assessment of the likely growth in demand for Welsh medium education over the next 10 or 20 years.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No.

Pollution

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many firms in Wales have been convicted under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations Act 1980, since 1981.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available centrally.

Free School Meals

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many schoolchildren in (a) Clwyd, (b) Mid Glamorgan and (c) Wales now receive free school meals.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The latest available information relating to the academic year 1983-84, is as follows:

	Number of pupils in maintained schools taking free school meals
(a) Clwyd	10,021
(b) Mid Glamorgan	18,892
(c) Wales	85,204

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of children receiving free school meals in each Welsh county, for Wales as a whole and for the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The latest available information relating to the academic year 1983-84, is as follows:

	Percentage of pupils present on census day taking free school meals*
Clwyd	15·6
Dyfed	15·2
Gwent	22·8
Gwynedd	19·6
Mid Glamorgan	21·7
Powys	13·8
South Glamorgan	20·5
West Glamorgan	19·8
Wales	19·3
United Kingdom*	16·6

* Autumn term 1983-84 in Wales, Northern Ireland and England. Spring term 1983-84 in Scotland.

Post Office (Employees)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were employed by the Post Office in Wales for each of the years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

Date	Number of employees
December 1978	6,977
December 1979	7,107
December 1980	7,228
December 1981	7,033
December 1982	6,943
December 1983	6,848
November 1984	6,929

Elderly Persons

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales are over retirement age; and what this figure represents as a percentage of the total population.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 30 June 1983 the estimated population over retiring age was 528,100, representing 18·8 per cent. of the total.

Afforested Land

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the area of land newly afforested since 1980 to the latest available date in Wales, making a distinction between coniferous plantations and other forestry schemes.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Planting statistics are published by the Forestry Commission in its annual reports. During the period 1 April 1980 to 31 March 1984 a total of 5,260 hectares of new planting — 4,997 hectares of conifers and 263 hectares of broadleaves— was carried out in Wales by the Forestry Commission and by the private sector with the aid of grants from the commission.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the area of land newly afforested since January 1980 to the latest available date in Wales; and if he will indicate the proportions planted by the Forestry Commission and private landowners, respectively.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Planting figures are compiled centrally on the basis of financial years beginning 1 April. During the period 1 April 1980 to 31 March a total of 5,260 hectares of new planting was undertaken in Wales, of which 1,720 hectares were planted by the Forestry Commission and 3,540 hectares by the private sector with the aid of grants from the commission.

Educational Establishments (Assistance)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales to which education establishments outside the state sector he has given regional development grant and special financial assistance.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Under arrangements announced in July 1974, details of selective financial assistance are published in British Business after the first payment is made. Pending such publication, information relating to individual applications is normally treated in confidence. In fact, only one offer of selective assistance has been made in respect of a private sector educational establishment in Wales. Exceptionally, the principal of the establishment concerned, New College, Cardiff, has agreed to my confirming that an offer of grant of £80,000 has been made subject to a number of conditions relating to the overall financing of the project.

No regional development grants have been paid in respect of such educational establishments.

Development Board for Rural Wales

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish details of the Mid-Wales grant for the Development Board for Rural Wales for each of the years after the loss of assisted area status by Mid-Wales in 1980; and if he will indicate the amount of Mid-Wales grant for 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Mid Wales development grant scheme was launched in November 1982. The basic allocation for 1983-84 was £175,000. The figure for 1984-85 is £380,000.

Details of the 1985-86 allocation will be published in the 1985-86 Supply Estimates. Allocations for subsequent years have not yet been determined.

Laura Ashley Company

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the amounts of cash to be given by the Development Board for Rural Wales to the Laura Ashley company for its expansion projects, as announced in the House on 10 December, and details of aid given by his Department and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Development Board for Rural Wales has not grant-aided the projects; its role will be to provide a new factory in Newtown for use by the company. Under arrangements announced in July 1974, details of selective financial assistance are published in British Business after the first payment is made. Pending such publication, information relating to individual applications is normally treated in confidence.

Tiryberth Primary School

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish all evidence received by his Department concerning the establishment of bilingual classes at Tiryberth primary school.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what submissions have been made to him by Mid-Glamorgan county council concerning the establishment of bilingual classes at Tiryberth primary school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In accordance with section 12(3) of the Education Act 1980, Mid-Glamorgan local education authority submitted observations on the objections.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales on what information he bases his decision to establish bilingual classes at Tiryberth primary school, Mid-Glamorgan.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Information was received from objectors, Mid-Glamorgan local education authority and Her Majesty's inspectors of schools.

Welsh Medium Schools

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on Welsh medium schools;

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on Welsh units in English language schools in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Government's policy for Welsh medium education was set out in "Welsh in Schools". It is for local education authorities, acting within the statutory framework, to decide what provision for such education is required and whether it should be made in units or separate schools.

ENERGY

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how his Department and its sponsored agencies classify, describe or define the plutonium, or the types of plutonium, produced in British nuclear reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: The plutonium produced in British civil nuclear reactors is not classified into different grades by the Department or its sponsored agencies. It is described simply as "plutonium".

Electricity Generation (Coal)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) how much coal per annum his Department and the Central Electricity Generating Board expect will be used in the generation of electricity in Britain by 1990, 2000, and 2010;

(2) what projections his Department and the Central Electricity Generating Board have made for the amount and percentage of electricity which will be generated by coal by 1990 and 2000.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department's most recent projections were published in October 1982 in an annex to its proof of evidence to the Sizewell inquiry.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ten o'clock Rule (Suspension)

Mr. Sayeed asked the Lord Privy Seal how many times per week on average the 10 o'clock rule has been suspended in this Parliament to date; and what is the corresponding figure for the last Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: Up to 7 December, the 10 o'clock rule has been suspended on average, 1·34 times per week in this Parliament; the corresponding figure for the last Parliament was 1·39.

Sitting Times

Mr. Sayeed asked the Lord Privy Seal how many times per week on average the House has sat after 11 o'clock in this Parliament to date; and what was the corresponding figure for the last Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: Up to 7 December the House has sat, on average, 2·6 times per week after 11 o'clock in this Parliament; the corresponding figure for the last Parliament was 2·6.

Departmental Select Committees

Mr. George asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, how many visits were made by each of the Departmental Select Committees, including visits by Sub-Committees, in the last Session, abroad and within the United Kingdom; and what is the total cost for each Committee for this Parliament to date, together with global figures for each Committee and for all Departmental Committees for the last Session.

Mr. Beith [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 361]: The information for Session 1983-84 is as follows. The accounts* for some of the visits are not complete and the figures given represent the costs to date.

In the present Session, 1984-85, a further seven visits within the United Kingdom have been made by six Committees at a cost to date of £2,022.

All-party and Parliamentary Groups

Mr. Cormack asked the Lord Privy Seal when it is proposed to implement the recommendations of the Second Report of the Services Committee, 1983-84, dealing with all-party and parliamentary groups.

Mr. Biffen: It has not proved practicable to bring the new system into force in time to affect bookings made by all-party and registered groups for the period between Christmas and Easter. Bookings for the period after Easter, which will open when the dates of the Easter adjournment are announced, will be the first to be made under the new system.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecommunications (Share Issue)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money was spent advertising the British Telecom share issue in evening or weekly newspapers published in Greater Manchester; and how much in total was spent on advertising on independent television channels, nationally and in the Granada viewing area.

Mr. Butcher: Payments to individual suppliers of services are commercially confidential, but the hon. Member may be assured that media expenditure in the Greater Manchester area was commensurate with that in other areas of the country.

BL (Public Money)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much public money has been made available to British Leyland in the last year.

Mr. Butcher: None: the final tranche of £90 million equity funding was paid in November 1983.

Micros in Schools

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was spent on micro computers in schools in each of the last five years; how many computers were procured for the money; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Department of Trade and Industry has spent some £13·4 million on the various micros in schools schemes over the past five years. The detailed figures are as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	nil
1981-82	1·2
1982-83	3·3
1983-84	6·7
1984-85*	2·2

* To date.

6,511 computers were provided to secondary schools under the schemes representing almost all secondary schools. To the end of November, just under 26,000 primary schools had applied for a computer out of an estimated 27,000 primary schools. The relevant offer to primary schools closes at the end of 1984 and it is anticipated that the majority of the remaining thousand will apply.

The figures represent assistance towards schools in purchasing computers, monitors and printers and a range of peripheral equipment.

These figures represent a considerable investment in educational micro-computing. They represent, however, only a small proportion of total spend in this area as schools have brought considerable numbers of additional micro-computers from their own resources and latest figures available suggest that the average number of micro-computers per secondary school is about 10. The average in primary schools is approximately 1·8. In addition, the Department of Education and Science and the Scottish Education Department have provided considerable financial support through the Micro-electronics Education Programme and the Scottish Micro-electronics Development Programme which have provided resources for curriculum development, software and teacher training.

As a result of these initiatives, the United Kingdom has a more advanced educational IT programme than any comparable country. No other country has a similar level of penetration within schools and most experts believe that United Kingdom educational software in particular is the most advanced in the World. The use of the computer as a teaching aid throughout the curriculum is a particular strength of the United Kingdom programme.

BSC (Stanton and Staveley Works)

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the proposed sale by the British Steel Corporation of its Stanton and Staveley works.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend announced on 5 December 1984 that he had decided, on the information before him and in accordance with the recommendation of the Director-General of Fair Trading, not to refer the proposed acquisition of Stanton and Staveley Ltd. by la Compagnie de Saint Gobain to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission under the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Car Exports (Spain)

Mr. Patrick Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to end discrimination by Spain against the United Kingdom export of cars; whether he would favour the establishment of a three-year programme for the progressive and substantial liberalisation of the Spanish car market independent of European Economic Community accession negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Spanish car market is, in comparison with the United Kingdom market, heavily protected although United Kingdom car imports are not treated any less favourably than imports from other Community countries. The only long term solution is through Spanish membership of the Community and during the accession negotiations the Government have been attempting, in consultation with our EC partners, to aim at a satisfactory solution of the high tariff problem in particular as it affects cars.

Auctions (Bidding Agreements)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, whether he will review the working of the Auctions (Bidding Agreements) Act 1927; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The Auctions (Bidding Agreements) Act 1927, which was amended in 1969, is not being considered for review at this time. I therefore see no need to make a statement.

Regional Policy

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received with regard to the new provisions for regional policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Over 500 written representations were received in response to the invitations in our White Paper "Regional Industrial Development". In addition, Ministers at the Department saw a great number of delegations representing a wide range of opinion.

My hon. Friend, the Minister of State for Industry, made a statement announcing the outcome of our review of regional industrial policy on 28 November.

Furs (Imports)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will now take steps to ban the import of skins of fur-bearing animals taken in the wild by steel-toothed traps.

Mr. Channon: Trade in skins of endangered species is already regulated under the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976. It would not be practicable to ban imports on the basis of trapping methods because of the difficulty in determining how furs had been obtained.

Free Trade Agreement (EC-Israel)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what evidence he has of third countries exploiting the free trade agreement between the EEC and Israel for the purpose of gaining duty-free access for manufactured goods to the EEC.

Mr. Channon: I have no information that there are any goods being imported into the Community duty-free from Israel which are not of Israeli origin for the purposes of the Community's agreement with Israel.

Regional Aid

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the recent changes to the assisted areas map for the purpose of regional aid will affect the eligibility of areas presently the subject of preparatory studies prior to integrated operations where a recommendation for an integrated development operation is made.

Mr. Trippier: The areas under study remain wholly or partly eligible for United Kingdom regional assistance and European regional development fund assistance, but there are no detailed EEC procedures or eligibility criteria for integrated operations and it is not possible to assume that integrated operations will follow after any of the studies. The studies should be seen as part of a continuing exploration of the concept of integrated operations.

Industrial Assistance

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the amount of money saved on each of the industrial assistance programmes as a result of the moratorium for the rest of the current financial year; and when he will entertain new applications for aid under each of these programmes.

Mr. Butcher: When the review was announced on 12 November, offers of innovation assistance to individual companies were running at the rate of about £10 million to £15 million per month. As my hon. Friend said in his announcement, the review will be completed within five months and a further announcement will be made then both on the balance of the Department's support and on when new applications can be considered.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the report by Professor Silberston on the multi-fibre arrangement is to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Today. A copy of the Report has been placed in the Library of the House.

My right hon. Friend, the then Secretary of State, asked Professor Silberston in July 1983 to carry out an independent study into the effect of trade restrictions in textiles and clothing, both on the British textiles and clothing industries and on the British economy generally. I am grateful for Professor Silberston's report, which I hope will be read widely.

The report notes that temporary restrictions have for some years applied to imports of textiles and clothing from developing countries under the multi-fibre arrangements, which suspends the normal trading obligations of the GATT. The report indicates that:

(i) these restrictions raise the retail price of clothing by perhaps 5% (more for lower-cost clothing) at a total cost to consumers of about £450m per annum; they also raise the cost of materials used by British clothing manufacturers;

(ii) the benefits of these higher prices accrue in part to British textile and clothing manufacturers, though the main benefit is to foreign suppliers;

(iii) the import restrictions make employment in the British textile and clothing industries somewhat higher than it would be without them. However, their macro-economic effects tend to depress employment elsewhere in the British economy. Overall, the restrictions tend to leave employment in the economy lower than it would be without them;

(iv) the cost-per-job of the employment safeguarded in the textiles and clothing industries (leaving aside jobs lost in other industries) exceeds average earnings in those industries;

(v) the British textiles and clothing industries face formidable barriers to their own exports in most parts of the world.

This is an important report about an important industry, which employs 2 per cent. of the nation's work force.

The Government would welcome the views of interested parties on Professor Silberston's report. It would be helpful to have comments as soon as possible before the Government takes a position on the future trade regime for textiles and clothing, prior to negotiations in the EC and the GATT.

Credits (Guarantees)

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to make any new arrangements to facilitate the restructuring, in accordance with Paris club or other similar international agreements, of credits guaranteed by the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: In order to facilitate the restructuring, in accordance with the terms of Paris club or other, similar, inter-governmental agreements, of commercial credits granted by United Kingdom suppliers and banks and guaranteed by the Export Credits Guarantee Department, I intend to use the powers contained in section 2(1) of the Export Guarantees and Overseas Investment Act 1978 to give guarantees in the national interest for the purpose of rendering economic assistance to countries outside the United Kingdom. The Export Credits Guarantee Department will give such new guarantees as may be necessary to implement such international debt restructuring agreements. The use of these powers in the circumstances I have described will assist the orderly repayment of debts owed to the United Kingdom.

Mineral Exploration

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement about the review of the scheme for providing grants for mineral exploration under the Mineral Exploration and Investment Grants Act 1972.

Mr. Trippier: When I announced the review of the mineral exploration grants scheme on 30 July, I hoped to be able to complete the review by November. However, on 12 November my hon. Friend the Minister of State announced a wider review of the balance of the Department's support for industrial research and development. Completion of the mineral exploration grant scheme review is now expected to be delayed until this wider review of the Department's support for innovation has been completed, in about four months' time.

The suspension of further offers of grants for mineral exploration, announced on 30 July, will continue during this extended review period.

China

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take further to promote trade between Britain and the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 10 December 1984, c. 345]: There are good prospects for the steady development of trade between Britain and China. The government will continue to give active support to the British companies' exporting efforts to China. During her visit to Beijing, my right hon. Friend the prime Minister, hopes to discuss trade questions with Chinese leaders.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are deeply concerned about the current level of unemployment, and some 698,000 people are at present benefiting from our employment and training measures. Sustainable employment depends on a healthy economy, competitive industry and a more flexible labour market. Our policies are directed to those ends and we continue to look for ways of building on what has been achieved so far.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage of men in the following age groups who were economically active in (a) 1979 and (b) 1983: (i) 18 to 24, (ii) 25 to 34, (iii) 35 to 44, (iv) 45 to 54, (v) 55 to 59 and (vi) 60 to 64 years of age.

Mr. Alan Clark: The proportions of men in the civilian labour force in Great Britain were as follows:

Per cent.

Age	1979	1983
16-24	79·4	79·5
25-34	95·4	93·7
35-44	96·3	95·4
45-54	95·4	93·2
55-59	90·8	84·2
60-64	73·0	59·5

Engineering Apprenticeships

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of new engineering apprenticeships (a) starting and (b) completed as a result of the work of the engineering industries training board in each of the latest two years for which data are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The engineering industry training board reports that it was notified of 10,857 new registrations for craft and technician apprenticeships for the year ended 31 March 1983, and 8,911 for the year ended 31 March 1984.

The board issued 13,137 certificates of craftsmanship to apprentices completing a second training module in the year ended 31 March 1983 and 11,919 certificates in the year ended 31 March 1984.

The number entering traditional apprenticeships will increasingly become irrelevant as a measure of the amount of skill training being undertaken in industry, due to the reform of existing training arrangements and public funding of first-year training under the youth training scheme.

Community Programme

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment further to his reply of 30 November, Official Report, column 620, how many unfilled places there are on the community programme; and where they are located.

Mr. Alan Clark: At the end of October, the community programme was some 4,000 places below its national target of 130,000 filled places. All those places would have been taken up in London and the south-east if their rate of progress in providing job opportunities on the programme had matched other regions. My hon. Friend announced on 26 March at c. 29 our targets for correcting imbalances in filled places between regions up to October 1986. On that basis, London will need to increase its current number of filled places by 60 per cent., the south-east by 35 per cent. and the midlands by 8 per cent. while other regions will either remain constant or make some reductions.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment, using information from the latest community programme follow-up survey, and in respect of the over 25-year-olds, over 52 weeks duration grouping, what percentage of those in employment at the time of the follow-up survey were (a) male (i) supervisory-married and (ii) supervisory-single, widowed, divorced or separated, or (b) female (i) supervisory-married and (ii) supervisory-single, widowed, divorced or separated; what proportion of each married sub-grouping has an employed spouse; and what percentage of each sub-category has children within the 0 to 15 years age range.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available exactly in the form requested. The information, where available, is:

	per cent.
Male:
Married	41
Single, Widowed, Separated or Divorced	30
Total	71
Female:
Married	28
Single, Widowed, Separated or Divorced	0
Total	28

Some survey forms were completed giving no indication of marital status.

The survey of former participants does not provide information on whether participants were supervisors, the employment status of any spouse or the ages of any children.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment, using information from the latest survey of participants on the community programme, if he will give the percentage of participants within the following categories: for the two standard eligibility groupings of 18 to 24 years of age, over 26 weeks duration grouping, and over 25 years of age, over 52 weeks duration grouping, what proportion are (I) married (a) male (i) supervisory and (ii) non-supervisory and (b) female (i) supervisory and (ii) non-supervisory; what proportion are (II) single, widowed, divorced or separated (a) male (i) supervisory and (ii) non-supervisory or (b) female (i) supervisory and (ii) non-supervisory; what proportion of each married sub-grouping have an employed spouse; and what proportion of each sub-grouping have children within the 0 to 15 years age range.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available exactly in the form requested. The information, where available, is:

Some survey forms were completed giving no indication of marital status.

The survey of former participants does not provide information on whether participants were supervisors, the employment status of any spouse or the ages of any children.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment, for the year to date, for Avon, the south-west and for Great Britain as a whole, for the Manpower Services Commission standard groupings of 18 to 24 years of age, over 26 weeks duration grouping and over 25 years of age, over 52 weeks duration grouping, what percentage of community programme participants are male (i) married and (ii) single, widowed, separated or divorced; what proportion of each sub-group are supervisory; and what percentage of each sub–group are not in receipt of any major benefit, such as housing benefits, supplementary benefits or family income supplement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available exactly in the form requested. The information, where available, is set out in the table:

Entrants during the year ending 31 October 1984	South-West Per cent.	Great Britain Per cent.
Aged 18-24	58	57
Aged 25 and over	42	42

Single, widowed, divorced or separated	73	70
Not in direct receipt of unemployment and/or supplementary benefit at the time of entry to the Programme	8	13

Figures for the County of Avon are not available.

Information is not collected on whether entrants are supervisors or were in receipt of housing benefit or family income supplement.

Hazardous Chemicals

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Employment if Her Majesty's Government will seek to negotiate an international convention on the manufacture of hazardous chemicals.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The manufacture of hazardous chemicals is already subject to extensive controls in the United Kingdom in respect of potential health hazards and risks to safety.

My right hon. Friend will this month be laying before the House the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations implementing the European Community Directive on major accident hazards. Aside from this directive, there are other international instruments relevant to the subject of hazardous substances. The Government will be ready to join in discussion of any proposals for further instruments prepared by the international agencies concerned.

In addition, the knowledge and expertise of the Health and Safety Executive is readily available to other countries who may wish to take advantage of it.

Health and Safety Inspectors (Hospital Visits)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment, in the last year for which figures are available, how many visits to hospitals were made by health and safety inspectors; and how many hospitals have not had a basic visit from a Health and Safety Executive inspector under the programme basic visits and follow-up.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During 1983, 3,788 visits to hospitals were made by inspectors of the Health and Safety Executive.

HSE records show that 50 hospitals have yet to receive a basic inspection under the basic inspection programme.

Hospitals (Crown Improvement and Prohibition Notices)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many Crown improvement notices and Crown prohibition notices were issued in each year since 1978 relating to hospital activity; and to what areas of hospital activity they related.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following tables provide a summary of the numbers of Crown notices issued relating to hospital activities:

Crown improvement notices relating to hospital activities

HOME DEPARTMENT

Home Defence Manual (Nuclear Weapons)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he hopes to issue the revised police manual of home defence, nuclear weapons, to include the effects of conventional and chemical or biological attack.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A revised version which includes the effects of conventional attack will be issued early next year. The Government are a party to the 1972 convention banning biological weapons. In the absence of a chemical weapons ban active consideration is being given to the detection and warning of danger presented by them and what protective measures can be taken. When this work is completed the results will be incorporated into the manual.

Parole

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young persons had been released from youth custody establishments on parole aged (a) 15 to 16 years, (b) 16 to 17 years, (c) 17 to 21 years, by the most recent date available.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information is given in the following table; it is not possible to distinguish between those discharged from youth custody establishments and those discharged from local prisons. Of the 1,483 young persons discharged, 444 were discharged in the 13¼ months up to 30 June 1984, and 1,039 (including all those aged under 17) in the following four months after the reduction of the minimum qualifying period for parole.

Young persons discharged from Prison Department establishments on parole licence, by age, 24 May 1983—31 October 1984

Police and Fire Services

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what criteria he uses when considering whether to approve capital projects such as centralised command and control systems within the fire services;

(2) what criteria he uses to approve capital projects, such as centralised vehicle repair workshops, within the fire services in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The approval of my right hon. and learned Friend is not required.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the criteria under which he gives approval to the establishment numbers of the police forces in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend considers applications for additional police officer posts in the light of the resources available nationally for increases in police manpower, and advice from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary. The main factors which he takes into account are set out in paragraphs 3 to 5 of Home Office circular No. 114/83, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Drugs Offences

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions for drug pushing have been secured in the Merseyside county police area in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is given in the following table:

Persons found guilty of unlawful supply of a controlled drug or possession of a controlled drug with intent to supply unlawfully Merseyside police force area, 1979-83 Number of persons

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Unlawful supply	4	8	4	4	29
Possession with intent to supply unlawfully	5	2	7	11	24
Total*	9	10	10	15	46

* In some cases the same person was found guilty of both offences so the sum of the individual figures is not always equal to the total.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the efforts being made to stop drug trafficking and drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: We are satisfied that Her Majesty's Customs, the police and other agencies are acting vigorously to combat drug trafficking and drug misuse. As shown by the recent initiatives described in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), on 22 November, at column 397-98, we attach a high priority to measures directed at achieving this objective.

Shoplifting

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps he is contemplating to encourage self-service stores to take preventive measures against shoplifting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Following the report published last year by the Home Office standing committee on crime prevention on "Shoplifting and Thefts by Shop Staff", we are now preparing a new publicity leaflet aimed primarily at small retailers which will contain a wide range of advice on preventive measures.

Police Pay

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a table showing the salary scales of police officers for April 1984 and April 1983; and if he will express these figures in both cash terms and in April 1980 prices.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The salary scales were as follows:

Rank	April 1983		April 1984
	Minimum £	Maximum £	Minimum £	Maximum £
Constable	6,189	9,798	6,708	10,620

Crime (Young Persons)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his plans for diverting as many young people as possible from the criminal justice system.

Mr. Mellor: We intend shortly to issue to chief officers of police new guidelines on cautioning which will encourage the more consistent and effective use of the caution. The guidelines will embody the principle that in the case of juvenile offenders there should be a presumption in favour of courses of action which fall short of prosecution, unless the individual circumstances of the case, in particular the seriousness of the offence, dictate otherwise.

Mr. Edward Hopson

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that Mr. Edward Hopson does not return to Coxley Close, Ealing, following his release from prison after serving his current sentence; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he proposes to take to ensure that Mr. Edward Hopson does not have private access to children after release from serving his current prison sentence;

(3) what psychological psychiatric help and personal supervision he is arranging for Mr. Edward Hopson while serving his current prison sentence and after his release.

Mr. Mellor: Mr. Hopson's position as a restricted patient who has been conditionally discharged from hospital under the provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983 will be reviewed during his current prison sentence in the light of the medical and other reports my right hon. and learned Friend receives, and a decision will be made towards the end of the sentence. The particular points mentioned by my hon. Friend will be fully considered.

The prison authorities are considering Mr. Hopson's needs while he is in prison. Responsibility for his medical care rests with the prison medical officer.

Prosecuting Solicitors Departments

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the county police force areas without a prosecuting solicitors department.

Mr. Mellor: Wiltshire is in the process of establishing a prosecuting solicitors' department. The remaining police areas without prosecuting solicitors' departments are Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire, Leicestershire, north Yorkshire, Staffordshire and Surrey.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the management consultants are likely to report on their study of various prosecuting solicitors departments.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to receive the report early next year.

Prisoners (Member's Correspondence)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department intends to reply to a letter dated 17 September from the hon. Member for Barking concerning self inflicted injuries suffered by three prisoners; and why, after nearly three months, the hon. Member was informed on 5 December that a reply would take a further few weeks.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member enquired in her letter about three prisoners involved in incidents in Holloway prison. Her letter also covered general questions of staffing and the new powers of remand to hospital under the Mental Health Act. Detailed inquiries were necessary: these had to be pursued against a background of the heavy pressure of work and correspondence which has resulted from the critical interest in Holloway prison this autumn. The recent consideration of the future of Holloway has led to the appointment of a project committee which will advise the Director General.

My noble Friend will reply very shortly and will then explain developments in greater detail.

Prisons (Drug Smuggling)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to the reply of 5 December, Official Report, column 184, how many incidents of attempted drug smuggling into Walton prison there have been over the past three years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on the problems of drug smuggling into Her Majesty's Prisons at the latest date.

Mr. Mellor: We attach much importance to keeping unauthorised drugs out of prisons and are determined that all appropriate counter-measures should be taken. These include calling in the police to investigate (and, if necessary, carry out a search) where there is reason to believe that a visitor intends to smuggle drugs. At Liverpool prison during 1984 so far (up to 11 December) the police have detected attempts of drug smuggling on 19 occasions and prison officers on nine occasions. No reliable figures are available for earlier years.

CND Communications (Interception)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has asked the Post Office and British Telecom to notify him of the results of their investigations into allegations of telephone tapping and interference with the mail of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

Mr. Brittan: The complaints which have been made about the provision of postal and telephone services are matters for the Post Office and British Telecom, but I would expect them to draw my attention to any matters arising from their investigations that may be relevant to my Ministerial responsibilities.

Elections (Impersonation)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details of (a) the number of offences reported and (b) the number of prosecutions for voting more than once in the general elections of 1983, 1979 and 1974 in (i) Northern Ireland and (ii) Great Britain.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 349]: In England and Wales the information collected centrally on notifiable offences recorded to the police does not separately distinguish offences against the Representation of the People Act 1949 or 1983. The available information on court proceedings is given below and does not separately distinguish offences of personation from other voting offences or between offences committed at general elections from those at by-election or local elections; information for 1974 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Shipowners (Investment Allowance)

18. Mr. Hill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to increase the investment allowances available to British shipowners.

Mr. Moore: I have no plans, beyond those already announced, for a provision in the next Finance Bill which will provide shipowners with greater flexibility in the use of writing down allowances on new ships.

Johnson Matthey

20. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with the governor of the Bank of England regarding the rescue of Johnson Matthey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: I have discussed with the governor of the Bank of England the events leading up to the rescue operation for Johnson Matthey Bankers. I hope to make a statement to the House shortly.

Government Policies (Finance)

21. Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what areas of policy currently financed by the United Kingdom budget will in future be financed by the European Economic Community budget in the event of an increase in United Kingdom gross payments to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Moore: The main effect of the agreement reached at the Foreign Affairs Council in Dublin on 4 December will be to restrain the growth in agricultural expenditure. This should allow non-agricultural expenditure such as regional and social expenditure, research and development, energy, science and technology expenditure, to take an increasing share of the Community budget.

Books and Periodicals (VAT)

22. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received opposing the imposition of value added tax on books.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Books and Periodicals (VAT)

36. Mr. Loyden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representation he has received about value added tax on books and periodicals during October and November.

43. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about the prospect of value added tax being introduced on the sale of books, newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers have received over 500 representations about the possible imposition of VAT on books, newspapers and periodicals. It is not practiable to give a seperate breakdown of representations received on books and periodicals alone.

Unemployment Rates (Assumptions)

23. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will revise the Treasury's methods of preparing assumptions of future rates of unemployment.

Mr. Peter Rees: I have no plans to do so.

Value Added Tax

24. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for extending the scope of value added tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: Although the Government favour a shift in the burden of taxation from taxes on earnings to taxes on spending, we have no set views at present on how this might best be done.

27. Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reply Her Majesty's Government have made to the reasoned opinion received from the Council of the European Communities regarding the incidence of value added tax zero rate in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 4 December.

7. Mr. Madden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the Government's response to the European Economic Community reasoned opinion on the sixth value added tax directive regarding value added tax zero rating in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: Our reply makes it absolutely clear that the United Kingdom Government do not accept the views set out in the reasoned opinion.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the amount of tax raised by increasing value added tax to 20 per cent. for (a) all items which currently have 15 per cent. value added tax imposed and (b) all items which currently have 15 per cent. value added tax imposed on them, except those associated with the building trade;

(2) what is his estimate of the expected amount of value added tax raised in a full year on those areas of the building trade liable to value added tax at 15 per cent.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of tax that would be raised by imposing value added tax at 15 per cent. on all books, periodicals and newspapers, except those specifically published for educational purposes.

Mr. Hayhoe: Imposing VAT at 15 per cent. on all books, newspapers and periodicals would raise about £375 million in a full year at 1984-85 prices. The effect of excluding those specifically published for educational purposes would depend on how broadly the term "educational" was defined.

Schedule D Assessments

26. Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to introduce a current-year basis of assessment for partnerships and individuals assessed under schedule D, cases I and II.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion, but have no immediate plans to introduce a current-year basis for partnerships and individuals assessed under cases I and II of schedule D. However, such a change remains a possibility for the future.

Workplace Nurseries

28. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the taxation of places at work place nurseries.

Mr. Moore: In common with most other benefits-in-kind, the benefit of an employer-subsidised nursery place is subject to tax in the hands of directors and certain employees—currently those earning at a rate of £8,500 a year or more—under legislation first introduced by the Labour Government in 1948.

£1 Coin

29. Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will redesign the £1 coin.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No.

Hot Take-away Food (VAT)

30. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the impact in terms of takings and employment of the imposition of 15 per cent. value added tax on hot take-away food.

Mr. Hayhoe: The limited information so far available suggests that during the first few months of VAT on hot take-away food, the overall level of sales was slightly down on the same period in 1983. But there has been substantial real growth in the take-away food industry in recent years and this long-term trend can be expected to continue.

Unemployment Costs

31. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total cost to the Exchequer in terms of lost receipts and extra expenditure of the increase in unemployment over the most recent 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Rees: Additional expenditure from the increase in unemployment over the 12 months to November 1984 is estimated to be about £269 million assuming the extra unemployed have average family circumstances.

Changes in revenue depend upon the causes of unemployment, and there is a wide range of possible effects. No single estimate can be given.

Economic Progress

32. Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest available statistics of economic recovery; and if he will make a statement on the likely duration of the recovery.

Mr. Peter Rees: Economic growth averaged 2¾ per cent. a year between the first halves of 1981 and 1984. Total fixed investment has contributed strongly to this, increasing by 6½ per cent. a year. The Industry Act forecast presented to the House on 12 November forecast GDP growth of 3½ per cent. for 1985.

Home Improvements (VAT)

33. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning value added tax on home improvements.

Mr. Hayhoe: Representations from both businesses and consumers are still being received, but much less frequently than in the weeks after the last Budget.

Pension Contributions (Tax Relief)

34. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what revenue would accrue from the abolition of tax relief on pension contributions.

Mr. Moore: I assume the hon. Member has in mind tax relief on pension contributions made by employees. The estimated cost of such relief is about £1,250 million at 1984-85 levels of income and pension contributions. However, the revenue which would accrue from abolition of the relief would depend on any changes which resulted in the levels and methods of provision for retirement and on whether—to avoid double taxation—any changes were made to the tax treatment of pensions in payment.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 13 December 1984

PRIME MINISTER

President Mitterrand (Meeting)

Q25. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the outcome of the discussions which she had with President Mitterand of France on 29 November.

The Prime Minister: Discussions during the Anglo-French summit in Paris on 29-30 November covered a wide range of bilateral and international questions and took place in a constructive and co-operative atmosphere. The President and I discussed collaborative projects, including the Channel tunnel, East-West relations and future development of the Community.

President Reagan (Meeting)

Q27. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on her objectives in her forthcoming meeting with the President of the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: At my meeting with President Reagan on 22 December I expect to review a range of international questions of importance to both our countries. Our meeting will provide a timely opportunity for me to hear the President's assessment of his Administration's priorities and policies for the next four years and to give my views on a number of issues of particular concern to Britain.

Disarmament

Q37. Mr. Hunter asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's contribution and attitude to multilateral disarmament negotiations since June 1983.

The Prime Minister: Our aim in the current multilateral arms control negotiations is the achievement of balanced and verifiable agreements which will guarantee security at a reduced level of armaments. To that end, since June 1983 we have continued to play an active and positive part in all areas of multilateral disarmament negotiations:

CONFERENCE ON DISARMAMENT (CD) IN GENEVA

June 1983

UK working paper on peaceful nuclear explosions in context of comprehensive test ban (CTB).

August 1983

UK working paper on verification of a CTB.

February 1984

UK proposal for challenge inspection in cases of suspected non-compliance with a future treaty banning chemical weapons.

July 1984

UK proposal for verification of non-diversion of chemicals to illicit military use.

CONFERENCE ON CONFIDENCE AND SECURITY BUILDING MEASURES AND DISARMAMENT IN EUROPE

January 1984

Western proposals for concrete confidence and security building measures.

MUTUAL AND BALANCED FORCE REDUCTIONS (BMFR)

April 1984

Presentation at MBFR talks in Vienna, of major Western initiative offering flexibility on data in return for agreement to enhanced verification measures.

We have also played an active part in the discussions on disarmament issues at the United Nations, including the UN First Committee, the Disarmament Commission and the Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean Peace Zone.

Baldernock

Q46. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Baldernock.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

Mr. Malone asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 13 December.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 13 December.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister (1) if, in view of the policies publicly stated by the Secretary of State for Transport regarding plans for a third London airport, he will have any role in determining quasi-judicially the Government's decision on the inspector's report on the Stansted inquiry;

(2) whether the speech by the Secretary of State for Transport, given in Manchester on Friday 7 December, regarding plans for a third London airport, represents Government policy.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport explained in his speech to the Manchester Central Conservative Association on 7 December that the Government's policy is to encourage the maximum use of regional airports where this can be justified by demand. It is not part of this policy to force traffic to the regions by constraining capacity in the south-east. The speech in no way prejudices his quasi-judicial role in determining the Stansted applications, which will be decided by him and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

National Health Service Management Board

Sir Peter Mills asked the Prime Minister when the Government will appoint a chairman for the National Health Service Management Board as recommended by the Griffiths inquiry.

depreciation allowance for new and second-hand United Kingdom ships, in addition to the present 25 per cent. allowance.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) and Harborough (Sir J. Farr).

Gross National Product

Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will compare the United Kingdom public sector borrowing requirement as a percentage of the gross national product over the past five fiscal years with that of the United States of America on the same statistical basis.

Mr. Peter Rees: Internationally comparable statistics on the public sector borrowing requirement are not available. The available statistics relate to general Government financing. On this basis, the United Kingdom deficit (as a proportion of GDP) fell from 4¼ per cent. to around 3¼ per cent. between 1978 and 1983, whilst the United States balance (as a proportion of GNP) changed from a surplus of ¼ per cent. to a deficit of 4 per cent. over the same period.

Budget Proposals

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had about new taxation measures for the 1985 Budget.

Mr. Moore: Several.

Industrial Demand and Output

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the level of industrial demand and output.

Mr. Lawson: Total industrial production in the three months to October was down 1 per cent. on a year earlier. This reflects a 9¾ per cent. fall in energy output, affected by the coal strike, and a 2¾ per cent. rise in manufacturing.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Bookshops (Police Raids)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General what advice was given by the Director of Public Prosecutions and the police concerning raids on bookshops for books dealing with drugs and homosexuality.

The Solicitor-General: Decisions as to the exercise in particular cases of powers of search and seizure are operational matters within the discretion of the chief officer of the police force or other enforcement agency concerned. In appropriate cases the Director of Public Prosecutions may give legal advice as to the extent of powers of search and seizure and the suitability of particular material as the basis of such action. Chief officers of police are under no obligation to tender advice to other enforcement authorities but it would be perfectly proper for them to do so.

I understand that the hon. Member has in mind the seizure of certain material from the bookshop Gay's the Word in Mount Pleasant, London by officers of HM Customs and Excise. No advice was given concerning this matter by the DPP. I have no reponsibility for the police and am not aware of the answer to the question in relation to them.

TRANSPORT

Marine Pilotage

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about marine pilotage.

Mr. Ridley: For the past 2½ years the Pilotage Commission with the assistance of Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co. has been discussing with representatives of the pilots and the shipowners the terms of a voluntary severance scheme for marine pilots. Unfortunately it has not proved possible to reach agreement on such a scheme.

I have therefore reviewed the whole question and I have concluded that the present statutory arrangements for pilotage, which have remained substantially unchanged since 1913, are inappropriate to present day requirements, and impose an unnecessary financial burden on the shipping industry.

I am today publishing a Green Paper containing proposals for a reform of pilotage legislation and am inviting views of the various groups affected. I have placed copies of the Green Paper in the Library. Copies are also available in the Vote Office.

The central feature of my proposals is the abolition of the present structure of pilotage authorities and pilotage committees, and the placing on harbour authorities of the responsibility for settling local arrangements for pilotage and for the provision of pilotage services into and out of their harbours. The statutory responsibilities of the Secretary of State would be much reduced.

The proposals envisage a statutory compensation scheme for pilots whose services are not required under the new regime: the scheme will be financed by shipping using United Kingdom ports. The Pilotage Commission will eventually be abolished, but I hope it will remain in being to assist with the transitional problems that will arise. Trinity House will cease to be a pilotage authority as such, but all harbour authorities will be free to engage Trinity House to assist them in meeting their new responsibilities if they choose.

I am confident that these proposals offer the chance of a new framework which will allow the provision of safe and efficient pilotage services in the future, while at the same time dealing equitably with existing members of a profession which can look back with pride on a distinguished tradition.

Air Accident, Bristol

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will conduct an inquiry into the recent accident at Bristol airport when an A300 Airbus of Iberian Airways overshot the runway with 245 people on board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The incident referred to did not involve serious damage to the aeroplane or injury to any persons and because of this it was not a notifiable accident as statutorily defined. It is not the usual practice for the accident investigation branch to investigate this type of occurrence and so on this occasion the chief inspector of accidents has decided that no further action from him is necessary. He is content for the Spanish authority to continue its own investigation as permitted by international agreement.

Aerial Crop Spraying

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for Transport how close aircraft are permitted to fly for the purposes of the aerial application of pesticides to, respectively, dwelling houses, schools, hospitals, buildings containing farm animals, other buildings and roads in each of the other member countries of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Comprehensive information is not available; the following figures, however, were produced for the Council of Europe committee of experts on pesticides:

Belgium
2,000 metres from dwellings
300 metres from single buildings
Denmark
300 metres from dwellings
25 metres from roads
Federal Republic of Germany
50 or 100 metres from other fields or objects*
Republic of Ireland
15 metres from buildings
50 metres from water
Netherlands
150 metres downwind from buildings
100 metres upwind

*It is not clear from the information provided how the two limits are applied.

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to seek to obtain powers to ban aerial spraying from specified areas.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Aerial spraying is subject to a wide range of controls exercised by the Civil Aviation Authority under the Air Navigation Order 1980. These include minimum distances which aircraft must maintain from houses, congested areas and sensitive areas such as hospitals, schools, children's playgrounds and stables. In addition fresh powers are being sought in clause 15 of the Food and Evnironment Protection Bill which is under consideration in another place. These would enable regulations imposing controls on the environmental safety of aerial spraying to be made to complement the controls currently exercised by the CAA.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many prosecutions there were in each of the years from 1980 for offences arising from aerial crop spraying.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The number of prosecutions brought by the Civil Aviation Authority and the Health and Safety Executive were as follows:

1980	0
1981	1
1982	1
1983	3
*1984	7

* Prosecutions initiated before 6 December 1984

In other cases where either the seriousness of the offence or the evidence available did not warrant bringing a prosecution operators and pilots were warned or cautioned.

Rail Accident (Salford)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the formal inquiry into the rail accident at Salford on 4 December to take place; where it will be held; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The inquiry will open, in public, at the Portland hotel in Manchester at 10 am on Friday 11 January 1985.

British Transport Police

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has held any consultations or received any communication from the British Transport Police Authority concerning proposals to reduce the number of officers employed by that force.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, but there is no reason why I should do so. The number of officers in the British Transport Police is a matter for the British Railways Board to consider, in conjunction with the British Transport Police Committee.

Road Accidents Survey

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the "Road Accidents Statistics, English Regions: 1982-83".

Mrs. Chalker: Around March 1985. The 1982 edition was published in March 1984.

Severn Crossing

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in the study of the proposed second crossing of the Severn; and if he will publish an interim report to inform interested parties of developments so far.

Mrs. Chalker: The study into how a second crossing of the River Severn might be provided commenced in August this year. During the first three months of the study the consultants have had preliminary discussions with local authorities and many statutory and representative bodies. They have also made an intial examination of traffic, engineering, environmental, planning and economic aspects of a second crossing. Many possibilities have been investigated for the location and type of a river crossing, and the link roads to the M4/M5 motorways.

A report on the work done in the first three months will be made available in the near future.

Overflights (Rules)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what rules govern overflights of naval dockyards and other military installations.

Mr. Ridley: All aircraft flying within the United Kingdom must observe the Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control Regulations 1981. Under rule 27, before an aircraft can fly within controlled air space the commander of the aircraft must file a flight plan and obtain air traffic control clearance for it. Outside controlled air space, aerodrome traffic zone restrictions apply in the vicinity of any military installation with an airfield or helicopeter landing area.

Rule 5 prohibits low flying except in certain circumstances. In addition there are permanent restrictions on flying in the vicinity of certain atomic energy establishments, certain security and other establishments in Northern Ireland and Scampton airfield because of training flights by the Red Arrows.

Under Article 81 of the Air Navigation Order 1980 foreign registered aircraft require my permission before undertaking aerial photography or aerial survey work anywhere in the United Kingdom.

Concessionary Fares

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends concessionary fares grants to local authorities to be calculated on the basis of grant-related expenditure allocation.

Mr. Ridley: There are no specific grants for concessionary fares. Concessionary fares grant-related expenditure allocations have been, and still are one component of overall GREAs which form part of the mechanism for allocating block grant. It is for each local authority to decide how its block grant allocation is used and the priority it gives to expenditure on particular services, including concessionary fares.

ENVIRONMENT

Radioactive Waste (Sea Disposal)

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received the report of the independent review of disposal of radioactive waste at sea, chaired by Professor Holliday; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The report of the independent review of sea disposal in the Atlantic, commissioned by the Government and the Trades Union Congress, has been published today. Copies have been placed in the Library at the House. My right hon. Friend, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and I are indebted to Professor Holliday and the three members of his team for their report, which is an extensive and searching review of the scientific evidence and of all the issues. We shall be discussing it with the Trades Union Congress in the new year. The report recognises that the science undertaken in the United Kingdom, relating to the disposal of radioactive wastes at sea, has been of the highest quality; and that the methematical modelling used to assess the safety of dumping may overestimate rather than underestimate the risks to man. The report reveals no evidence of harm to man or the natural environment. But in the team's view there remain some uncertainties about the long-term natural processes involved.

They recommend that the use of the sea disposal route for low and intermediate-level wastes should not be resumed until completion of the international reviews now in progress. We accept that recommendation, which allows for the scheduled completion by September 1985 of the London dumping convention review, and the review of the site by the nuclear energy agency of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development, also due to be completed in 1985. In addition future dumping would also be subject to any changes that might be made to the definition of prohibited wastes which is currently being considered by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Secondly, the report recommends that a comparative assessment should be made and published of all disposal and storage options, whether at sea or on land, in order to establish the best practicable environmental options for the various types of low and intermediate-level radioactive waste. My Department will carry out such an assessment, in consultation with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and with the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee, with the aim of producing a published report by the summer of next year.

The report makes further recommendations about research, on the storage of radioactive waste, and on the exclusion from sea dumping of persistent synthetic materials which may float. The Government accept these recommendtions and we are considering how best to implement them. As regards monitoring, we will discuss with other member countries of the NEA whether the existing international programme should be extended.

Zoological Society

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now announce details of the support the Government are giving to the Zoological Society of London.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Zoological Society of London is a learned society with an international reputation in the fields of conservation and scientific research. To further these aims the society maintains the Institute of Zoology and manages the animal collections at Regents Park and Whipsnade.

The Government support these objectives and have recognised that the society needs both short and long term assistance.

I propose to make a block revenue grant of £2 million a year, with an additional grant of £1 million in 1984-85 for the Society to pay off its overdraft. I shall make a capital grant of £1 million in 1985-86 and further capital grants thereafter of up to £¾ million a year to match £ for £ what the Society can raise from private sources. These figures are in cash terms and will not subsequently be adjusted for inflation. The grants will be subject to detailed conditions to be set out in a financial memorandum. The Government remain concerned that the society should use its full endeavours to contain costs and maximise income and has asked the Society to strengthen the marketing expertise available to it. The Institute of Zoology will be subject to an independent review. The Government will review the level and scope of its support after 3 years with particular regard to the progress the Society has made in implementing the Business Plan and to the extent to which they have been able to improve on the performance envisaged in it. The Government expects that there will be reductions after that in the annual call on the Exchequer.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is now able to make a statement about the Government response to the Ordnance Survey review committee recommendations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Ordnance Survey review committee was appointed in January 1978, under the Chairmanship of Sir David Serpell, with the following terms of reference:

"Taking account of the views of users and other interested parties, in the context of national surveying and mapping needs, to consider and make recommendations about the longer term policies and activities of the Ordnance Survey and ways of financing them".

The committee reported in July 1979 and I would like to thank it for its excellent work. However, when the terms of reference were set, it had been assumed that Ordnance Survey would remain a Government Department, and therefore the committee's report considered no other structural possibilities. In July 1981 the then Secretary of State for the Environment announced that the long term future of the survey would be considered against the full range of possible structures whether inside the Civil Service or wholly or partially outside it. Widespread consultations were held and in January this year my right hon. Friend announced that he was accepting the Ordnance Survey advisory board recommendation that Ordnance Survey should remain a vote funded Civil Service Department. He also announced that a detailed response to the Serpell report would be published in 1984.

During the last few years Ordnance Survey has taken account of the recommendation of Sir David Serpell's committee when formulating its plans and programmes and, as a result, considerable progress has been made. This is reflected in the Government response to the Ordnance Survey review committee's report and copies of that response have been placed in the Library today.

The Government have also decided to increase the resources of Ordnance Survey in 1985-86. This will help Ordnance Survey to implement some of the more important recommendations which have not been implemented to date. In particular there will be increased activity on core tasks and the programme to digitise the Ordnance Survey large scale maps will be accelerated.

In January, my right hon. Friend also announced that a rolling policy and plan for the Ordnance Survey should be prepared and published. This plan has now been approved and copies have also been placed in the Library today.

The Ordnance Survey has been through a long period of uncertainty about its future and its remit. I am glad that this uncertainty has now ended. Throughout this period the continued enthusiasm and dedication of both management and staff has been impressive.

Housing

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any changes in the housing factor used in the grant-related expenditure assessment figures.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer to my right hon. Friend's statement to the House on 11 December at c. 910 concerning the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86.

Welfield Site, Hatfield (Development)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the inquiry into the planned development of the Welfield site in Hatfield for the expansion of geriatric and other patient care by the health authority is to take place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The public local inquiry into the demolition of Welfield, a grade II listed building in Hatfield, proposed by the East Hertfordshire area health authority for erection of a psycho-geriatric unit, is to take place on Wednesday, 13 February 1985. This date was the earliest possible one which was convenient for all the parties concerned. The inquiry will enable all the options to be considered before a decision is made on the future of this important building.

Centre 21, Enderby

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position regarding the planning application for a proposed superstore, Centre 21, at Enderby, Leicestershire.

Mr. Macfarlane: This matter is still under consideration. I will announce very shortly how I propose to take this case forward.

Infrastructure Projects

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the National Council of Building Material Producers concerning investment by Her Majesty's Government in infrastructure projects; and if he has any plans to meet their representatives in the near future.

Mr. Gow: The National Council of Building Material Producers has sent me copies of its two reports, by the Policy Studies Institute on "Rebuilding the Infrastructure —The Needs of English Cities and Towns"; and by Professor Paul Ormerod, of the Henley centre for forecasting, on "The Economic Impact of Increased Public Spending on Construction".

I met the president of the National Council of Building Material Producers on 11 December to discuss these reports. I agreed to consider both carefully, before arranging a further meeting.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Bulmer asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to establish the number and names of historic buildings financed or administered by the metropolitan county councils or Greater London council the responsibility for which will be affected by the Local Government Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: There is no immediate need to establish a precise list at this stage, but my right hon. Friend will keep this important aspect under review.

Fish Farms (Effluent)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate a grant for research into the effect of effluent from fish farms on river systems.

Mr. Macfarlane: My Department's long term water research requirements committee is considering whether research is needed into the effects of fish farming on river quality. I will take their advice into account when formulating the Department's own research programme.

Agriculture and the Environment

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the memorandum which was presented to the Council of Ministers of the European Communities on 6 December concerning the interaction of agriculture and the environment; and if he will publish a precis of it in the Official Report.

Mr. Waldegrave: The text of the United Kingdom memorandum on agriculture and the environment which was presented to the Council of Ministers on 6 December is reproduced below. In introducing it I stressed the importance of the subject to Her Majesty's Government. The Commission has undertaken to report to the Council on the issues mentioned in the memorandum.

This memorandum seeks the Council's support for a proposal that the Commission prepare a review of progress made towards ensuring that environmental concerns are taken into account in Community agricultural policies and reviewing the scope for further action.

There is increasing public interest within the Community about the effects of various policies on the environment and a growing recognition of the need for a rational and balanced approach towards the exploitation of natural resources, including the development of improved methods of food production. The third action programme on the environment reflects that awareness as well as the principles underlying the world conservation strategy in its commitment to the integration of the environmental dimension in the development of agriculture and socio-economic policies.

The United Kingdom has taken steps at both national and Community level to achieve a better balance between the promotion of a flourishing agricultural industry and safeguarding of the environment.

Nationally, Her Majesty's Government has introduced legislation providing increased protection for landscape and wildlife and creating a statutory framework for encouraging greater understanding between farming and conservation interests of each others' aims and objectives. Within the Community, the United Kingdom has tabled amendments to the proposed regulation on agricultural structures revising previous directives on the modernisation of farming which, if accepted, would enable member states to encourage farming practices in environmentally sensitive areas which are consistent with conservation objectives.

The United Kingdom believes it would be most helpful if, in the light of inter alia the negotiations on the regulation which are proceeding in the high level agriculture group, the Commission could report on general progress made towards reflecting the principles of the third action programme in the development of agricultural and environmental policy, including the question of research in this field, and identify the scope for further action. The Council is accordingly invited to endorse a proposal that the Commission might consider this further and report back to the Council within six months.

Environmental Pollution

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is yet in a position to respond to the Tenth Report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: We have published our response today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The response is in two parts: part I is a brief statement of the principles which govern our approach to environmental protection policy; part II sets out in full our response to each of the Royal Commission's detailed recommendations, which covered a wide range of pollution control issues.

The Government are grateful to Professor Sir Richard Southwood and his colleagues for the hard work and careful analysis which they devoted to the production of the Tenth Report.

Boxing

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received alleging anti-competitive practices in boxing promotion; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have as yet received no representations alleging anti-competitive practices on boxing promotion. These would be a matter for the British Boxing Board of Control and, if warranted by the circumstances, the Office of Fair Trading.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if there will be a significant change in the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87 because of the loss of rate income from the National Coal Board due to the fall in production already apparent in the current year 1983-84 as a result of the current miners' dispute.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is too early to anticipate the decisions to be taken on the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities and their associations which have made representations about the probable effects of the miners' dispute upon loss of rate income to local authorities from the National Coal Board, in view of the formula established under the National Coal Board Rateable Valuation Order 1977.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have received no such representations.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will be employing the special development order procedure under the Town and Country Planning Acts in respect of the application for the expansion of Stansted Airport.

Mr. Gow: During the second reading of the Civil Aviation Bill, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport announced that the inspector's report would be published and that the House would have an opportunity to debate airports policy in the light of the report. The report was published on 10 December. After the debate, decisions on the Stansted applications will be taken under normal planning procedures.

Council House Sales

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the assumptions used to estimate the capital receipts to local authorities for 1985-86 in respect of the sale of council dwellings, including the number of sales, the sale price net of discount, the average level of discount and the ratio of private finance.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 12 December 1984, c.500]: It is estimated that of the forecast of £1,595 million for total receipts, £1,305 million will be from the sale of council houses not £1,460 million as stated in the answer. The detailed forecasts and the underlying assumptions about council house sales, are as given in my earlier answer. I apologise to the hon. Member for this error.

SOCIAL SERVICES

National Insurance Contributions

53. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the increase in employees' national insurance contributions since 1978-79 in 1984 prices and current prices.

Mr. Whitney: It is not possible to provide the information in the form requested. Employees' national insurance contributions (NICs) are calculated as a percentage of gross earnings. The percentages for the relevant years are as follows:

	Employees not contracted-out of the state earnings related pension scheme	Employees contracted-out of the state earnings related pension scheme†
1978-79	6·5	4
1979-80	6·5	4
1980-81	6·75	4·25
1981-82	7·75	5·25
1982-83	8·75	6·25
1983-84	9·0	6·85
1984-85	9·0	6·85
1985-86*	9·0	6·85

* Proposed.

† These employees pay NICs at the not contracted-out rate on their earnings up to the lower earnings limit and at the contracted-out rate on earnings between the lower and upper earnings limits.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the recently announced additional £5 million funding in connection with drug abuse is to be used for treatment facilities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: £3 million has been allocated to our drugs initiative for projects to provide treatment and rehabilitation, which was previously over-subscribed. Much of this will be taken up by applications already received but a circular will be issued to health and local authorities and to the voluntary sector, advising that money will be available for especially innovative and interesting new projects.

In addition, the interdepartmental ministerial group on the misuse of drugs, which meets regularly under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs is giving the highest priority to reviewing prevention and enforcement policies. I have therefore decided that £2 million is to be earmarked for a prevention campaign.

Rent Rebates and Allowances

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the estimated totals for 1984-85 of rent rebates and rent allowances, distinguishing between certificated and non-certificated benefit.

Mr. Whitney: The latest estimates of rent rebate and allowance recipients in Great Britain for 1984-85 are as follows:

	Standard	Certificated
Rent rebates	1,545,000	1,919,000
Rent allowances	281,000	540,000

Current indications are that the final figures will be higher. Detailed, revised estimates are expected to be available during February 1985.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of people in Dundee in receipt of supplementary benefit in May 1979; what is the current figure; and how the figures are broken down for pensioners, one-parent families and unemployed claimants.

Mr. Whitney: Dundee is covered for supplementary benefit purposes by two DHSS Offices.

The total number of supplementary benefit cases handled by these two offices at may 1979 and May 1984, the latest date of which figures are available, was:—

	May 1979	May 1984
Dundee (East)	7,904	11,542
Dundee (West)	7,140	10,358

Of these, the figures for pensioners, single parent families and unemployed claimants at these dates were:—

	May 1979	May 1984
Dundee (East)
Pensioners	3,524	2,912
Single parent families	1,086	1,645
Unemployed	2,497	5,485
Dundee (West)
Pensioners	3,944	3,671
Single parent families	588	1,011
Unemployed	1,810	4,196

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what have been the public expenditure savings in each year since 1980 arising from the deduction from the supplementary benefit of strikers of amounts which they are deemed to be receiving in strike pay; and what is his estimate of the savings for the current year.

Mr. Newton: The deductions which are made under Section 6(1) of the Social Security (No. 2) Act do not depend upon, or assume, payment of strike pay.

It is not possible to provide precise figures for total public expenditure savings arising from these deductions.

This is because, in cases where the amount of supplementary benefit entitlement is less than the amount of the deduction, the application of the deduction will result in no benefit being paid; records are not kept of these cases.

Records are however available for the total number of actual payments to strikers and estimates of the amount of benefit withheld from these as a result of the deduction are as follows:

Year	Number of payments to strikers	Estimated benefit savings arising from deductions £
1981	28,032	341,000
1982	16,848	219,000
1983	48,648	707,000
1984*	1,322,170	19,833,000

* To 20 November

Dental Estimates Board Appeals

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of appeals outstanding under regulation 21 of the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunal) Regulations 1974; how many are processed per month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for the appeal by Mr. G. J. Burkitt, of 8 Chilterns Close, Flackwell Health, Buckinghamshire, against a decision of the Dental Estimates Board to be heard before Christmas 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At the end of November 1984, there were 1,210 such appeals awaiting hearing. Since January 1984, 687 appeals have been heard, an average of 63 a month.

There has been a marked increase in the number of appeals made in 1984. In the 11 months from January to November 1984, 1,604 were received compared with 734 for the same period in 1983. Because of the unexpectedly high number of appeals there have inevitably been delays in arranging hearings.

As regards the appeal by Mr. Burkitt, our Department expects to arrange the hearing in January 1985.

Opticians

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many qualified opticians have been in practice during each of the last five years; how many have retired; and how many new opticians have been trained.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have information in the form requested. The table gives the total number of opticians registered with the General Optical Council and the number of newly qualified registrants. The number who are practising is not known but the table shows the number who have undertaken to provide services under the NHS General Opthalmic Service (GOS).

(England figures)

	At 31 December
	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Number on the General Optical Council Register
Ophthalmic Opticians	4,925	5,013	5,033	5,086	5,165
Dispensing Opticians	2,121	2,322	2,487	2,594	2,674
Newly qualified registrants (United Kingdom figure)
Ophthalmic Opticians	238	274	245	265	271
Dispensing Opticians	220	250	276	224	192
Numbers in the General Opthalmic Service
Ophthalmic Opticians	4,617	4,715	4,738	4,797	4,871
Dispensing Opticians	1,919	2,084	2,204	2,306	2,392

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many trained opticians are women; and how many of these are practising.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At 31 December 1983 the General Optical Council's register listed 1,223 women as ophthalmic opticians and 826 as dispensing opticians in England. We do not have precise information about the number of women who are practising but 25 per cent. of opticians in the General Ophthalmic Service are women.

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to arrangements for refresher training for opticians.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The British College of Ophthalmic Opticians has recently taken over responsibility from the joint academic board for supervising refresher training courses for opticians. Our Department liaises with the college and provides financial support for courses relevant to the needs of opticians who provide services under the General Ophthalmic Service. In 1983-84 we sponsored 17 such courses.

Dental Preventive Care

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what level of funding was allocated to dental preventive care and the improvement of educational and treatment standards in each of the last five years; what is the figure for the current year; and if he has any plans to increase resources devoted to this part of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not allocate predetermined funds centrally for dental preventive care to either the General or the Community Dental Services. Our method of funding dentistry means that the extent of such treatment is determined by dentists in the light of individual patients' needs.

The funding of dental education is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Our Department does however fund centrally postgraduate refresher training of general dental practitioners and the expenditure figures for the period requested are as follows:

	£ thousands
1979-80	145
1980-81	182
1981-82	208
1982-83	256
1983-84	262
1984-85*	277

* Estimate.

The improvement of treatment standards is a matter for the dental profession though the Government has a role to play through the monitoring undertaken by the dental reference service and the dental estimates board.

Dental Patients

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the trend in attendances by dental patients from moderate income brackets since the recent increases in National Health Service patient charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no recent informtion on attendances by adult patients.

Hospital Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of people so far made redundant as a consequence of the privatisation of hospital services; what percentage this is of the people previously providing the service; if he will categorise the redundancies by sex and by whether full or part-time; and whether following privatisation, there has been an increase in the proportion of women part-time workers in the National Health Service earning a rate of pay below the lower limit for national insurance contributions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect centrally information on total redundancies or the earnings of individual part–time workers.

Back Pain

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will tabulate in the Official Report which Government Committees are investigating back pain; if the results are to be published and on which dates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are not aware of any such Government Committees but there is a considerable body of research being conducted into the causes and treatment of back pain funded by the Department and the Medical Research Council. This is an area to which high priority has been given.

Back Injuries

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost, in the last year for which figures are available, to the National Health Service of back injuries to National Health Service employees caused by their work; how many working days are lost through such injuries; what advice was given to health authorities by his Department following the 1984 report of the Health and Safety Commission on the lifting of patients in the Health Services; and what response there has been from health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed information centrally. The Healh and Safety Commission's report on the lifting of patients in the Health Services has been sent to every health authority. The Department has received the report of a major research project into back injuries sustained by nurses and other health service workers by the University of Surrey. We are examining its recommendations together with those of the Health and Safety Commission and other reports with a view to considering what further advice can usefully be given to health authorities.

NHS Services (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) in how many cases the competitive tendering process for National Health Service services has led to industrial unrest in the National Health Service, including strikes; and if he will identify the cases where the strike has lasted more than one week;

(2) in how many cases a district health authority has had complaints about the efficiency of private contractors to which it had awarded a service contract.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many contracts have so far been awarded by district health authorities after competitive tendering; what proportion and how many have gone to private contractors; if he will categorise the contracts according to the type of service provided; and what proportion and how many of the successful contractors belong to trade associations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the right hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 30 October and 30 November at columns 967 and 623-24, respectively.

NHS Employees (Accidents)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many accidents there have been in each year since 1980 to National Health Service employees and how many were (a) fatalities, (b) major injuries and (c) accidents resulting in absences of three days or more.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally.

Monitoring Services

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost for the average hospital of monitoring services provided by an external contractor compared with having the service provided internally.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally. Authorities need to monitor the standards of in-house or contractor-provided services. We have advised health authorities that any extra cost of monitoring should be included when comparing the lowest commercial tender with the in-house tender.

Private Contractors (Services)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will request district health authorities, in their monitoring of private contractors providing services, to ensure that contractors fulfill their statutory requirements, including those relating to wage levels agreed by wages councils.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Contractors will be well aware of the statutory requirements under which they must operate.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department takes to monitor the performance of private contractors who have been awarded contracts for hospital cleaning and laundry services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The monitoring of the performance of contractors is the responsibility of the health authorities concerned. It is obviously important for authorities to monitor the performance of in-house or contractor-provided services of this kind. If services do not reach the required standard, the authority should take management action to raise standards in the case of in-house services or require the contractor to comply with the specifications of his contract in the case of an outside contractor.

Child Sex Abuse

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities do not list child sex abuse as a risk category; and if he will name them.

Mr. John Patten: Child abuse registers in most areas are held by local authority social services departments on behalf of all authorities—including health authorities—and agencies. The criteria for registration should be agreed by those bodies and will therefore vary locally. The Department does not collect information about or from the registers routinely, but we know that agencies are becoming increasingly aware of the need to recognise cases of sexual abuse and act accordingly.

Computer Dispute, Newcastle

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that all practical steps have been taken to resolve the dispute at the national computer centre at Newcastle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have made every effort to reach a negotiated settlement to end the dispute and members of two of the unions concerned—the Society of Civil and Public Servants and the Civil Service Union — have accepted our proposals and resumed duty. I understand that representatives of the national executive committee of the other union — the Civil and Public Servants Association — are this week seeking to persuade their striking members to return to work. As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 27 November, at columns 458-59, we urge those still taking action to re-examine swiftly their position; meanwhile, we are considering what further steps should be taken to restore the service that pensioners and the public are entitled to expect.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department has had about the Minister for Health's reply on 31 October concerning the shortfall in the number of trained occupational therapists in the National Health Service; what information had been conveyed to his Department by the College of Occupational Therapists on this matter before the parliamentary reply was given; if he now intends to revise the reply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received 10 letters from hon. Members on this matter.

Before my reply to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 31 October, at column 1077, our Department had received from the College of Occupational Therapists a short summary of the results of a survey of shortages of occupational therapists in the NHS. However, that summary provided insufficient detail about the scope and statistical basis of the survey to enable us to appraise the validity of the inferences drawn by the college about the extent of the reported shortfall.

Since 31 October we have received further information from the College of Occupational Therapists which, as I mentioned in my reply of 4 December at column 171, to the hon. Member for Eccles, we are considering together with other information provided by health authorities.

Generic Products (Information Service)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has undertaken any study into the potential cost of supplying a medical and technical information service for generic products on a basis provided at present by research-based companies for their own drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The generic drugs to be prescribable under the proposals for limiting the range of minor drugs on the National Health Service are well known to the medical and pharmaceutical professions and are well documented. I therefore see no need for any such service.

Prisoners (Relatives' Visits)

Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, how much public money has been paid since 1974 to the wives and children of prisoners in Parkhurst prison to enable them to visit their relations in the prison.

Mr. Whitney: Information about visits to prisoners is not collected in the form requested.

Overseas Medical Students

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in which Third world countries arrangements exist for medical students to be allowed to use their six-week elective period for study in those countries.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The General Medical Council education committee's recommendations permit elective periods of study to be undertaken overseas at the discretion of medical schools. Ministers are not responsible for these arrangements, and we do not collect detailed information about them.

Private Patients

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the report of the audit of 37 health authorities of the collection of money from private patients using National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Ministers asked for this special audit to be carried out. Statutory audit reports have now been issued to those individual health authorities in which the auditors' findings indicate a need for action. The authorities must consider what steps they need to take, and we expect them to do this in open session unless there are compelling public interest reasons for not doing so.

Cell Culture Techniques

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress being made in research relating to cell culture techniques designed to replace the use of animals in experiments.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that very considerable progress has been made in the use of cell cultures. They are now routinely used in the early screening of new chemicals and, over the whole field of biomedical research, we understand that there are now more experiments using in vitro alternatives, such as isolated organs, tissues, cells or cell constituents than whole animals.

The Government welcome this progress and are taking active steps to promote it further. All licensees under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 are regularly reminded of the need to develop and use alternatives wherever practicable. Under the new legislation proposed to replace the 1876 Act they will be effectively required to do so. In addition, the Government have made a substantial grant to the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments for its work on the development and use of cell cultures.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe (Aid)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of United Kingdom aid to Zimbabwe was spent on seconding foreign consultants in each of the last four years.

Mr. Raison: None.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much was spent on aid to Zimbabwe in each of the last four years; and of that sum how much and what percentage was spent on health care, education and the secondment of foreign consultants in medicine and surgery.

Mr. Raison: British aid to Zimbabwe in the last four years was as follows:

	£ million
1980	36·405
1981	17·132
1982	21·464
1983	19·590
Total	94·591

Neither health nor education are sectors which the British and Zimbabwe Governments have identified as priority ones for British aid. Of the total, £35,000 (0·04 per cent.) was spent on health care and £1·3 million (1·6 per cent.) on education. None of it was spent on the secondment of foreign consultants in medicine and surgery. A substantial part of a £12 million grant for reconstruction and a £20 million grant for land resettlement has been used by the Zimbabwe authorities to provide facilities such as schools and clinics, but the precise figures are not readily available.

Ethiopia

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the shipping and other costs broken down into separate categories of shipping grain from Southampton to Massawa in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: No grain financed from the United Kingdom aid programme has been shipped from Southampton to Massawa this year. However, 6,500 tons of wheat is expected to leave Hull on 12 December for Massawa. Final costs are not yet available but expenditure is estimated to be:

6,500 tonnes of wheat (with bags)	708,500
Sea freight	182,000
Port and handling costs; charges at Massawa (including bagging)	105,300

These figures do not include the cost of transport and distribution in Ethiopia, which will be around £700,000, and which we have promised to meet.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Awards

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much is spent by each local authority on processing student awards.

Mr. Brooke: Each authority will have its own machinery to deal with student awards and information on the cost or operation of specific aspects of LEA administrative arrangements is not held centrally.

Student Unions

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will estimate the cost to public funds of contributions on the students' behalf to compulsory membership of student unions;

(2) if he will consider introducing legislation to provide for the voluntary membership of student unions;

(3) if he will estimate the savings to his Department if membership of student unions were made voluntary.

Mr. Brooke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Student Funds (Misuse)

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he proposes to take to prevent the abuse of public funds through students representatives incurring expenditure for political purposes; whether he will introduce legislation on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General issued guidance in autumn 1983 which makes it clear that student unions in England and Wales may not spend money from funds subject to charitable trusts in supporting political causes which are not incidental to the objects of the charity. My right hon. and learned Friend will consider documented complaints alleging the misuse of such funds and will, where appropriate, act on them—as he has done in one case this week.

Children (Special Educational Needs)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department has considered ways in which more detailed statistics and information can be collected (a) to identify those children with special educational needs and (b) to monitor implementation of the Education Act 1981; what information his Department currently collects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: I am writing to the hon. Member.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what basis information is collected at birth or in early childhood on children with special educational needs by local education authorities; and if this is followed up by further data collection.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Teachers

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers are known to be employed within Leicestershire; and whether he has any information as to the number of teachers who are unemployed.

Mr. Dunn: The number of teachers employed in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in Leicestershire in September 1984 was 7,716, counting part-time teachers on the basis of their full-time equivalences. The September return does not include teachers in special education or qualified teachers providing education otherwise than at school. No information is available on the number of teachers in Leicestershire who are unemployed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Short Brothers plc

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about funding in the current year of Short Brothers plc.

Mr. Hurd: Following a review earlier this year of Short Brothers' corporate plan, and taking current market conditions into account, the Government have now authorised an external financing limit of £95 million for the period April 1980 to 31 March 1985. Within this sum the Government have agreed to provide £6·5 million grant assistance this year to enable the company to continue development of its aircraft, aerostructures and missile activities. The assistance will include payments under a launch-aid contract for the SD360 and design, development and training grants.

Dairy Farmers

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider allocating to those dairy farmers who, during the last 10 years, have been driven from their holdings close to the frontier with the Irish Republic as a result of terrorist activity a dairy produce quota consistent with their level of production at the time when they were forced to leave their farms.

Dr. Boyson: The European Community regulations make no specific provision for allocation of additional quota to producers who have left border farms as a result of terrorist activity. However, producers in these circumstances who submitted a claim by 21 August 1984 under the exceptional hardship provisions of the United Kingdom Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984 will have their case considered by the independent dairy produce quota tribunal for Northern Ireland.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners are presently serving sentences for offences connected with terrorism in Northern Ireland, having been sentenced to be detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure.

Mr. Scott: There are at present 61 persons serving sentences of detention during the Secretary of State's pleasure. All were convicted of murder charges tried as scheduled offences.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure have served (a) eight years, (b) nine years, (c) 10 years and (d) more than 10 years.

Mr. Scott: Eighteen have served between eight and nine years; 19 between nine and 10 years; and eight have served 10 years or longer.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure have had a release date set (a) prior to 23 October and (b) since 23 October.

Mr. Scott: During the period from 1 January 1980 until 23 October 1984, seven persons serving sentences of detention during pleasure were released on licence or had provisional release dates fixed. Since 23 October, two more have been given provisional dates.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure will have their sentences reviewed, with the prospect of a release date being set, during the next six months.

Mr. Scott: On present indications about 15 such prisoners will have their cases reviewed within the next six months: but it is not possible to say at this stage what the outcome will be.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he has implemented, since 23 October, any measures designed to provide information for persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure and their relatives about procedures for the review of indeterminate sentences; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has, since 23 October, developed procedures for informing persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure of the results of reviews of their cases; and if he will make a statement.

(3) if he has, since 23 October, altered or modified the review system for persons detained during the Secretary of State's pleasure; and if he has any plans to do so in the future.

Mr. Scott: I hope early next year to be able to make widely available a memorandum explaining the law in Northern Ireland relating to life and other indeterminate sentences and the procedures for the review of individual cases. This will include the law relating to persons held during the Secretary of State's pleasure. Copies will be given to the inmates concerned, and to relatives and others who inquire on their behalf. Meanwhile, steps are being taken to inform inmates in advance when their cases are to be considered by the review board and of the subsequent result, and inmates will be given the opportunity to make written representations to the board. These procedures will be explained in the forthcoming memorandum of guidance. I have no plans at present to make other changes to the system for reviewing the cases of persons held during the Secretary of State's pleasure, but I continue to keep it under regular review.

Incident (Linden Street)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, of the Royal Ulster Constabulary officers who took part in a Landrover patrol in the vicinity of Linden Street, Belfast, on 9 July 1981, how many (a) are still serving in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and (b) have been promoted in rank since that date.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 298]: The 11 police officers involved in the patrol are still serving in the Royal Ulster Constabulary: three have been promoted.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many claims for damages have been made to date for alleged injury by plastic bullets fired by (a) the Army and (b) the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland; what have been the results so far; in how many cases liability has been admitted; in how many cases the court has made the findings of liablity; and what is the total sum of damages paid to date.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 298]: 68 claims have been made against the Police Authority for Northern Ireland in respect of injury allegedly caused by plastic baton rounds fired by the police. The courts have made findings of liability in four of these cases. Three other cases have been settled out of court without an admission of liability. The total sum involved in these seven cases was £83,065. Information in respect of similar claims against the Army and in respect of any applications under criminal injuries compensation legislation is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sri Lanka

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he is proposing with the Sri Lankan Government concerning the rights of Tamil-speaking people repatriated from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: None.

Poland (Human Rights)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Polish Government about the respect for human rights in Poland on the occasion of the third anniversary of the banning of Solidarity on 13 December.

Mr. Rifkind: We made clear publicly in 1982 and have subsequently repeated, that we deplored the action of the Polish authorities in dissolving Solidarity and in refusing to allow Polish workers to decide for themselves what trade union organisations should represent them. The ban was inconsistent with the spirit of the Helsinki final act.

During my official discussions in Poland from 3-7 November I raised various aspects of human rights with the Polish authorities and conveyed the widespread parliamentary and public concern in the United Kingdom at the continued detention of political prisoners, including Solidarity members Bogdan Lis and Piotr Mierzejewski.

We welcome the recent release from detention of Mr. Lis and Mr. Mierzejewski. We remain concerned, however, about human rights in Poland. In our further exchanges with the Poles we will emphasize those concerns where appropriate.

Non-visa foreign Nationals

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what fee is charged for non-visa foreign nationals who require letters of consent in order to enter the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: The charge is £6. However, from 1 January 1985, the fee for a letter of consent will be increased to £10.

EEC Financial Guidelines

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the recently agreed EEC financial guidelines are to be conveyed to the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: The text on budget discipline, which was formally adopted by the Council in Dublin on 4 December, is recorded in the minutes of the Council and is already available to the Council of Agriculture Ministers and to all other compositions of the Council.

Council of Agriculture Ministers (Agenda)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to ensure that the recently agreed EEC financial guidelines are placed on the agenda for the next meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: We shall ensure that the requirements of budget discipline as now agreed are taken into account in all future discussions of the Agriculture Council.

Falkland Islands

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made plans to restrict the number of fishing vessels operating in Falkland Islands waters in order to control the depletion and renewal of fish stocks in the areas in question.

Interest Rates

35. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the level of interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Interest rates have fallen back substantially from their July peak, and are now close to post-Budget levels which were the lowest for several years. But I should always like them to be as low as possible consistent with the needs of monetary policy.

41. Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he makes of the relationship between the size of the public sector borrowing requirement and the level of general interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A sustained reduction in the PSBR should contribute to a sustained reduction in the general level of interest rates. But there are other influences on interest rates, particularly in the short-term. For example, higher overseas rates will tend to increase the level of United Kingdom rates consistent with any particular level of the PSBR.

EC (Budgetary Discipline)

37. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if a mechanism for ensuring budgetary restraint by the European Economic Community has yet been agreed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reported to the House on 5 December, the Foreign Affairs Council adopted the text on budgetary discipline on 4 December. The document was among those of which the House was invited to take note in its debate on 11 December.

Merchant Fleet

38. Sir John Farr asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce fiscal improvements designed to reverse the decline in the number of ships owned and registered in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion. It has already been announced that the next Finance Bill will include a provision to give greater flexibility in the use of writing down allowances for new ships.

House Prices

39. Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumption he has made on interest rates in 1985 to arrive at his forecast figure in table 1·3 of his autumn statement of a 4 per cent. increase in housing prices in the fourth quarter of 1985.

Mr. Peter Rees: It has never been the practice to reveal interest rate assumptions.

Employment Trends

42. Mr. Tracey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his best estimate of the current trend of employment.

Mr. Peter Rees: The employed labour force is estimated to have risen by a quarter of a million in the year to June 1984. The forecast published in the autumn statement is consistent with continued growth in the year ahead.

Third World Indebtedness

44. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate by how much Third world indebtedness to British banks increases for each 1 per cent. increase in British interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As 1 per cent. rise in sterling interest rates would increase the servicing costs of non-oil developing countries' debt with British banks by at most around £29 million a year. There would be an offsetting increase of about the same amount in interest due on sterling deposits from these countries.

Land Conservation (Capital Transfer Tax)

45. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will seek to extend capital transfer tax relief to land of conservation interest.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion. He will, I know, however, be aware that conservation objectives are already recognised in the capital transfer tax code, which provides exemption for land of outstanding scenic, historic or scientific interest, and for land adjoining a historic house which is essential for the protection of the character and amenities of the house.

Local Government Reform (Expenditure)

46. Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the next public expenditure White Paper, he will include a table drawing together all expenditure in connection with the abolition of the metropolitan councils and the Greater London council.

Mr. Peter Rees: No. The financial effects of the Local Government Bill are, however, considered in the explanatory and financial memorandum of that Bill.

Tax Credit Scheme

47. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will investigate the feasibility of a tax credit scheme.

Mr. Moore: We have no present plans to introduce such a scheme.

Merchant Seamen (Tax Relief)

48. Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the withdrawal of tax relief on merchant seamen spending more than 30 days outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moore: During the passage of the Finance (No. 2) Bill 1984, Treasury Ministers received some 1,500 letters from seafarers and those representing them. Since the Bill became law we have received about 160 more letters on this issue, mostly within the last month.

Public Expenditure Targets

49 Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress towards achieving the public expenditure targets outlined in the "Autumn Statement".

Mr. Peter Rees: I have nothing to add at this stage to my right hon. Friend's autumn statement and his and my comments in the House when it was debated on Thursday 6 December. I intend to publish the annual White Paper detailing the plans outlined in the autumn statement in the new year.

Taxation Revenues

50. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in taxation revenues since 1978-79 measured in 1984 prices.

Mr. Moore: The estimated increase in taxation revenues and national insurance contributions since 1978-79 measured at 1984-85 prices is £24 billion, £11 billion of which is the estimated increase in North sea tax revenues.

Occupational Pension Funds (Taxation)

51. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to tax the income and capital gains of occupational pension funds.

Mr. Moore: I am aware of recent speculation on this subject. It is our normal policy not to comment on such speculation.

Personal Taxation (Employment Creation)

52. Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will detail the stages in the process by which Her Majesty's Government believe that reductions in the burden of personal direct taxation will reduce the number of those now unemployed.

Mr. Peter Rees: A reduction in personal taxation will improve incentives and the supply side of the economy. These effects are difficult to model precisely, but the net result over time is likely to be higher output, employment and demand. Greater dynamism in the economy would mean an increased rate of economic growth, thereby creating the conditions under which more jobs will be created.

Finance Council

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Economic and Finance Council in Brussels on 10 December.

Mr. Lawson: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council.

The Council adopted negotiating mandates on export credits for aircraft and mixed credits. The Council reached agreement to extend for two years the medium term financial assistance facility and to adopt the Commission's annual report on the economic situation in the Community.

Ministers also considered a Commission paper on strengthening the European monetary system. This issue was referred back to Committees for further consideration.

The Council also considered a number of other issues, including FEOGA guidance expenditure; the non-life insurance services draft directive; measures concerning travellers' allowances; the draft unit trust directive; and the 20th VAT directive.

Investment

16. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the fall in net investment by industrial and commercial companies from nearly £4 billion in 1979 to £½ billion in 1983.

Mr. Peter Rees: Gross investment is a better measure of capital expenditure. On that basis, gross domestic fixed capital formation in 1980 prices stood at £43·9 billion in 1979, at £38 billion in 1981 and by 1983 had risen to £42·4 billion.

Money Supply

25. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the money supply is growing within the Government's target ranges.

Mr. Peter Rees: A large build-up in bank deposits associated with the BT issue has distorted the broad money figures for banking November, although MO was not affected. Over the target period to banking October, both aggregates were within their target ranges, and MO is still well on track.

Job Creation

40. Ms. Clare Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what factors he attributes the difference in the growth in the number of jobs in the economy between 1974 to 1979 and 1979 to 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: The difference in the growth in the number of jobs in the economy between 1974 to 1979 and 1979 to 1984 reflects a long overdue reduction in levels of overmanning in British industry, the depth of the world recession and excessive growth in real wages. The Government's policies have laid the foundation for a sustainable increase in employment. The employed labour force has in fact been rising since March 1983.

Pension Funds (Taxation)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in any consideration of additional taxation of pension funds, he will take into account the possible effects on the solvency of those funds or of the institutions which have guaranteed the payment of the benefits.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people have contributed to pension schemes for which income tax is reclaimable on contributions in each of the last three years for which figures are available;

(2) how many pension schemes have been in operation for each of the last five years for which figures are available, from which, under present regulations, lump sum payments would be tax free.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Ships (Depreciation Allowance)

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will introduce a 50 per cent.

million in 1983-84. Information as to the cost of subsidising midday meals for boarding pupils is not available centrally.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received regarding the proposed reorganisation of the Forestry Commission in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend has received representations on this matter from the following, as well as from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central:

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower);
The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan);
The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley);
The trade union side of the Forestry Commission's south Wales Whitley Council;
The Wales TUC;
Cardiff city council.

However, the prime responsibility for the organisation and efficient management of the Forestry Commission in Wales lies with the forestry commissions.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Human Settlement Projects

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the level of support from the overseas aid programme for human settlement projects over the last five years; what projects are currently being supported; and which British companies have benefited from contracts in connection with these.

Mr. Raison: The information requested, covering housing and land settlement projects, is as follows:

Year	Housing £000	Land settlement £000
1979	2,931	1,303
1980	2,269	929
1981	49	2,130
1982	9,159	4,777
1983	5,313	2,981

Note: Projects in the dependencies or recently independent countries in the Caribbean and Pacific are not included in these figures as the detailed statistical data are not readily available.

Projects currently being supported are as follows:

Country	Project
India	Housing and Urban development
Malawi	Rural housing
Solomon Islands	Housing development	through the Commonwealth Development Corporation
Botswana	Low cost housing	through the Commonwealth Development Corporation
Kenya	Land purchase
Swaziland	Land purchase
Zimbabwe	Land resettlement

Information is not available about British companies benefiting from contracts under these projects; however, in both categories, the bulk of expenditure covers local costs where British companies are not usually involved.

UN Development Programme

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the level of funding of the United Nations development programme by Her Majesty's Government (a) in constant prices and (b) as a percentage of total overseas aid for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Raison: The information requested is as follows, together with the cash contributions to UNDP for each of the years quoted:

UNDP Contribution

	Cash £ million	Constant 1983 prices £ million	As percentage of total overseas aid
1974	9·3	29·5	2·5
1975	14·7	36·7	3·2
1976	13·6	29·7	2·5
1977	20·0	38·3	3·3
1978	25·4	43·9	3·4
1979	28·5	43·0	3·0
1980	15·0	18·9	1·6
1981	17·5	19·7	1·5
1982	18·5	19·4	1·7
1983	18·5	18·5	1·6

CIVIL SERVICE

Government Legislation (Drafting)

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Civil Service if any preparation of Government legislation has been done by other than the official parliamentary draftsmen in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Apart from a certain number of Consolidation Acts drafted under contract by retired parliamentary counsel, some drafting of Consolidation Acts was done by parliamentary agents in 1974 and 1975.

Parliamentary Draftsmen

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether he has any plans to increase the number of parliamentary draftsmen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: There are at present 23 parliamentary counsel—of all grades—of whom four are seconded to the Law Commission. Steps are being taken to recruit five more assistant parliamentary counsel, with a view to increasing from 19 to 22 the number of counsel working in the Parliamentary Counsel Office, and from four to six the number seconded to the Law Commission.

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many pages of legislation have been prepared by parliamentary draftsmen in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Hayhoe: In round figures, the number of pages of non-Scottish legislation prepared by parliamentary draftsmen in each of the past 10 years was:

	New Acts	Consolidation Acts	Total
1974	1,360	320	1,680
1975	1,690	640	2,330
1976	1,400	370	1,770

	New Acts	Consolidation Acts	Total
1977	790	370	1,160
1978	830	280	1,110
1979	580	660	1,240
1980	1,470	780	2,250
1981	1,330	690	2,020
1982	1,360	400	1,760
1983	660	590	1,250

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the total number of parliamentary draftsmen who have been working full-time on the preparation of legislation in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of parliamentary draftsmen who were working full-time on the preparation of non-Scottish legislation on 1 January in each of the years in question was:

	In the Parliamentary Counsel Office	At the Law Commission	Total
1974	17	5	22
1975	19	5	24
1976	19	5	24
1977	20	5	25
1978	20	5	25
1979	20	4	24
1980	18	5	23
1981	18	4	22
1982	17	4	21
1983	19	6	25

ENERGY

British Gas Showrooms

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made concerning the privatisation of British Gas showrooms.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: During the past year the sale of the British Gas interest in Wytch farm and the flotation of Enterprise Oil have been successfully carried through. In gas, as in other industries, the possibilities for further introduction of private capital are being carefully examined.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement about the miners' strike.

Mr. David Hunt: This damaging dispute has been sought and provoked by the NUM leadership and imposed on its own membership without a ballot. There is no justification for this strike. The board's offer is the best in the industry's history and has been accepted by the other unions in the mining industry.

No one wishes more than this Government to see an early and constructive settlement to this dispute. Any initiative is welcome if it offers the prospect of a realistic settlement that can offer the industry a good future. The NUM has yet to show that it is interested in such a settlement.

Plutonium (Isotope Composition)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information the Central Electricity Generating Board records as to the isotope composition of the plutonium vested in the United Kingdom civil nuclear power programme.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a matter of day-to-day management for the CEGB.

PRIME MINISTER

Children (Boarding Schools)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the cost to Her Majesty's Government of (a) educating the children of servants of the Crown at boarding schools and (b) financing places in boarding schools for the children of other persons; and if, in each case, she will set out the parental contributions at various income levels compared with the parental contribution to be demanded of those whose children win a place in an institution of higher learning.

The Prime Minister: The total cost of the various Government boarding allowance schemes for public servants was about £83 million in 1983-84. Such allowances are paid only in appropriately limited circumstances and are not related to income. The only other Government expenditure on boarding fees arises under the aided pupils scheme for music and ballet schools and amounted to some £400,000 in 1983-84. Parental contributions may by required under that scheme, but details of the scale for 1985-86 have yet to be determined. Details of the 1985-86 parental income scale for student grants were set out in the reply of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 14 November 1984 at columns 238-39.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be (a) the loss of revenue if tax thresholds were raised to £3,000 per year for a single person and £6,000 a year for a married couple and (b) the saving in expenditure if child benefit were abolished; and if she will estimate the financial effect on a man with a wife and two children whose income was £100 per week of (i) each of the above changes and (ii) the introduction of both changes simultaneously.

The Prime Minister: The cost of raising tax thresholds to the levels specified would be about £12 billion in a full year, at 1984-85 levels of income and allowances. The public expenditure cost of child benefit at the current rate of £6·86 per child per week is about £4,430 million in a full year, on the basis of the number of beneficiaries in 1984-85. A married couple with gross income of £100 per week, where the wife was not working, would pay £613·50 less tax than under the 1984-85 tax regime. They would lose £13·70 per week—£712.40 in a year—from the abolition of child benefit. If the two changes were introduced simultaneously, they would lose £98·90 in a full year.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the latest agreement on the EEC budget meets the requirement that spending under the common agricltural policy should fall as a proportion of the total; and if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage of the total budget taken by the common agricultural policy each year since 1972, the anticipated figure in the current year, and the forecast for 1985.

The Prime Minister: The Council's agreement on budgetary discipline provides that expenditure relating to agricultural markets, as defined for the purposes of the agreement, will increase by less than the rate of growth of the Community's own resources base.

Expenditure on the common agricultural policy as a percentage of the total Community budget between 1972 and 1984 is as follows. The 1985 budget has not yet been adopted.

Year	Percentage
1972	89·0
1973	82·4
1974	75·4
1975	78·1
1976	76·6
1977	74·3
1978	79·2
1979	75·7
1980	73·3
1981	65·4
1982	64·0
1983	68·6
1984	70·3

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the decision to set aside more money for spending on the common agricultural policy in 1985 implies an increase in agricultural surpluses; and for what surpluses provision has been made in the 1985 budget compared with 1983.

The Prime Minister: No Community budget has yet been adopted for 1985. Provision is not made in Community budgets for any specific level of surpluses, but some of the expenditure provided for relates to the disposal of surpluses. However, the quantities actually disposed of in any given year will depend upon many factors, including the detailed management of agricultural markets during the year.

Higher Education

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether it is the Government's policy that students in higher education should pursue their studies at an institution within travelling distance from their parents' home regardless of the circumstances.

The Prime Minister: This Government, like their predecessors, believe that there is merit in students studying from the parental home where that is practicable.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what proportion of the population aged 18 to 21 years receives higher education in the United Kingdom compared with Germany, Japan, France and the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: Information in the form requested is not readily available. Comparisons of participation rates in higher education between countries are influenced by the structure of higher education in each country, in particular by the age of entry and the length of course. In some countries students enter higher education later than in the United Kingdom and take longer to qualify.

A meaningful comparison can be obtained by showing all new entrants to higher education as a percentage of the age group within the typical age range for the country in question. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has published statistics on this basis. In the table column 1 shows the age range encompassing at least 70 per cent. of all entrants to full-time higher education in each country, the yearly average size of which forms the basis for the calculation of participation. For example for the United Kingdom the size of the typical year group is the total number of 18 and 19-year-olds divided by two. Column 2 shows new entrants to higher education in 1982 as a percentage of the age group in the typical age range.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what statistical information she has concerning the level of Government contribution to the cost of higher education in the United Kingdom and in other countries so far as the student's contribution is concerned; and if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom's principal overseas competitors how central and local government finance the places of students at universities, distinguishing tuition fees from maintenance.

The Prime Minister: In 1982-83 students' families were asked to contribute a sum equivalent to about 5·6 per cent. of the Government's total expenditure on higher education in the United Kingdom. Information on other countries is not available for the purpose of comparisons with the United Kingdom. The latest available information on the financing of higher education overseas is contained within statistical bulletin 9/84 of the Department of Education and Science, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what information she has about the extent to which university students in Germany, France and Italy are required to pay the whole of their tuition fees; and if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the extent of any derogations from this rule.

The Prime Minister: I understand that university students are not required to pay tuition fees in the Federal Republic of Germany or in France, but that they are required to do so in Italy. I have no information about any derogations from those practices.

Industry (Financial Aid)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister if she will set out systematically the financial aids available from Government to industry, British and foreign; and if she will indicate how Her Majesty's Government intend to exercise their discretionary powers of aid in those areas where these exist.

The Prime Minister: The broad programmes of assistance offered by a number of Departments are set out in the annual public expenditure White Papers. Details are contained in the annual Estimates. Assistance is available to industry in the United Kingdom irrespective of the nationality of ownership or of controlling interests. A major criterion for aid will continue to be value for money. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry announced on 28 November the conclusions of the review on regional policy to increase cost effectiveness. My hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology announced on 12 November a review of support for innovation to the same end.

Social Security Commissioners

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list the functions which will be transferred from the Secretary of State for Social Services to the Lord Chancellor in relation to social security commissioners and their office in January 1985.

The Prime Minister: From 1 January 1985, the Lord Chancellor will have administrative responsibility for the work of the Social Security Commissioners in addition to his current responsibility for their appointment. This change involves a transfer of three sets of functions from the Secretary of State for Social Services to the Lord Chancellor:

(a) the remuneration, expenses and pensions of the Commissioners;

(b) the administration of their offices in England and Wales (the Secretary of State for Scotland will exercise these responsibilities for the office in Scotland), and

(c) the making of regulations with respect to proceedings before them.

EC (Grain Stores)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister what steps she intends to take to press for the release of grain stores from the European Community to ease the degree of famine in Ethiopia.

The Prime Minister: The European Council in Dublin agreed on 4 December that the Community and the member states should provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain before the next harvest for countries in Africa affected by drought, including Ethiopia.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Exchequer Subvention

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the amount of the direct subvention by the British Exchequer to Northern Ireland in each financial year since 1968; and what are the amounts budgeted for in future financial years.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

	£ million
1968-69	74
1969-70	74
1970-71	88
1971-72	126
1972-73	181
1973-74	312
1974-75	389
1975-76	565
1976-77	620
1977-78	*688
1978-79	848
1979-80	944
1980-81	1,090
1981-82	1,064
1982-83	1,149
1983-84	1,305
1984-85†	1,397

* Excludes a once for all payment of £250 million to cover redemption of the Northern Ireland Electricity Service borrowing.

† Provisional.

Figures are not available for future years.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve are currently estimated to be Catholics; and what proportion this represents of the manpower of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve separately.

Mr. Scott: Although details are not kept of the religious denomination of members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and its Reserve, I understand that about one tenth of the regular force comes from the Catholic community.

Firearms Certificates

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the number of private firearms certificates currently issued in Northern Ireland, together with details of the division of such certificates between the Protestant and Catholic communities; and how many certificates are held by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and its Reserve and the Royal Ulster Constabulary and its Reserve.

Mr. Scott: At 30 November 1984, 85,880 firearms certificates were on issue to persons in Northern Ireland. Of these, 866 were held by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and 212 by members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and its Reserve. Information is not kept on the religious denomination of firearm certificate holders.

TRANSPORT

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of the M1 motorway are lit; in which county areas the lit sections are; and what further plans he has to light sections of (a) the M1 motorway and (b) other motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: Sixty-eight miles of the M1 motorway are lit.

The other information that my hon. Friend seeks is not readily available, so I shall write to him shortly.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much of the M25 is presently unlit; if he will list the sections presently unlit; and if he will estimate the cost of lighting the stretches so far unlit.

Mrs. Chalker: The following sections of the M25, totalling approximately 29 miles, are open to traffic and unlit: junctions 2 to 3, junctions 5 to 6, junctions 6 to 7, junctions 7 to 8, junctions 10 to 11, junctions 11 to 12, junctions 12 to 13—partially lit—junctions 17 to 18 and junctions 18 to 19.

The estimated cost, at 1982-83 prices, of lighting these sections of motorway is very approximately £2·7 million, but the final cost could be more depending on the lighting system used.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if in the light of the accident on 11 December on the M25, he will make it his policy to light all stretches of that motorway so far unlit; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on 12 December 1984, at column 528. It would be premature to reach any conclusions until the examination of all the data is completed.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether any arrangements have been made for the policing of the docklands light railway.

Mrs. Chalker: Arrangements for the policing of this railway, which is due to come into operation in mid-1987, are still under consideration.

Travel Concessions

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that travel concessions affected by any legislation concerning buses will be available for all buses, all taxis and all minibuses.

Mr. David Mitchell: We are still considering, in the light of the responses to our consultation paper, the availability of concessionary fares on taxi and minibus services. An announcement will be made before the Bill is introduced.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce a countrywide scheme of travel concessions or public transport.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for local authorities to decide what arrangements to make for concessionary travel in their areas, and how to help elderly people most effectively within the resources available to them.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that the Bill concerning buses will guarantee the value of travel concessions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: under our proposals local authorities will retain the power to decide what level of travel concessions to provide.

Driving Test

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people during the past year have had to re-take the driving test because they have acquired a physical disability.

Mr. Ridley: In the 12 months from 1 December 1983 to 30 November 1984, 236 such people were required to take a driving test.

British Airways

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the preparations and the arrangements for the public flotation of British Airways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will withdraw his Department's "Keep Low" campaign regarding drinking and driving.

Mrs. Chalker: No. I believe that the campaign has an important part to play in making young people more aware of the dangers of drinking and driving and in encouraging responsible attitudes.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend his Department's current advertising campaign concerning drinking and driving so that it does not encourage anyone to partake of alcoholic drinks and then to drive.

Mrs. Chalker: The aim of the campaign is to make young people more aware of the dangers of drinking and driving in a way to which they will respond. The campaign does not offer any encouragement for the view that it is safe to drink before driving, and I believe that the audience at whom it is aimed will understand its message quite clearly.

Oxford Circus Station (Fire)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will provide extra revenue support for London Regional Transport to compensate it for any losses caused by the Oxford Circus station fire.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no plans to do so. London Regional Transport is currently discussing with the assessors the basis of an insurance claim following the station fire at Oxford Circus.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has asked the Railways Inspectorate for a report on the Oxford Circus station fire on 23 November.

Mrs. Chalker: The Railway Inspectorate is receiving detailed reports on the fire from London Regional Transport and the London fire brigade. It will study these in the light of its investigation of previous fires at Finsbury Park (1976) and Goodge Street (1981) and will then report on any measures that should be taken to prevent a recurrence, or to improve the handling of emergencies of that kind.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the expected cost of reopening Oxford Circus Victoria line platforms to the public.

Mrs. Chalker: London Regional Transport is not yet able to make a firm estimate, but preliminary indications are that the cost of reopening the Victoria and Bakerloo line platforms at Oxford Circus could be in the region of £1 million to £2 million. Further expenditure will be needed to refubish the station to current standards.

London and Metropolitan Counties

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in addition to the studies described in his Department's press notices of 20 November, any further contracts are going to be commissioned to study urban movement and assess problems in London or in other metropolitan counties.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no present plans for similar studies.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present rate of value added tax on children's footwear in each of the 10 member nations of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Lawson: Young children's footwear is zero rated in the United Kingdom. On the latest available information, the position in other EC countries is understood to be as follows:

	Percentage
Belgium	17
Denmark	22
France	18·6
Germany	14
Ireland	0
Italy	18
Luxembourg	12
Netherlands	19

VAT has not yet been introduced in Greece.

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will take steps to exclude the Post Office's datapost courier service and Argonaut freight forwarding service from the exemption to the Value Added Tax (General) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: Amending legislation to exclude the Post Office's datapost service from the exemption will be brought before Parliament early in the new year. The Argonaut freight forwarding service, as it is understood to be currently operating, does not benefit from the exemption.

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the bodies entitled to take advantage of the provisions of regulation 33 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1980, as substituted by article 6 of the Value Added Tax (General) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: The provisions of regulation 6 of the Value-Added Tax (General) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984 are available to any importer who is registered for VAT.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of tax raised by increasing value added tax to 20 per cent. for (a) all items which currently have 15 per cent. value added tax imposed and (b) all items which currently have 15 per cent. value added tax imposed on them, except those associated with the building trade.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 569]: The estimates of net additional revenue in a full-year are (a) about £4 billion and (b) about £3·8 billion. Estimate (b) assumes that professional building work or repair, maintenance or alteration continues to be taxed at 15 per cent., but that the purchase of DIY materials is taxed at 20 per cent.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the expected amount of value added tax raised in a full year on those areas of the building trade liable to value added tax at 15 per cent.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 569]: A little over £600 million.

Tobacco Products

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the price elasticity for tobacco products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The price elasticity of demand used for tobacco products is minus 0·5.

"Official Report"

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Official Report in bound form is now one year behind in publication; and if he will indicate what steps he proposes to take in order to rectify this situation.

Mr. Hayhoe: The delay in publication of bound volumes of the Official Report is attributable to delay in the supply of indexes. HMSO is in close touch with the Editor and Librarian with the aim of overcoming its present difficulties.

DEFENCE

Crown Proceedings Act 1974

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to seek repeal of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot yet add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 31 October, at column 1121.

HMS Vernon

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he contemplates the release of any land associated with HMS Vernon within the next 18 months.

Mr. Lee: HMS Vernon is to be home to both Army and Royal Navy diving training establishments from 1985. A general study, including HMS Vernon into naval requirements in the Portsmouth area is under way. No disposal of land relating to HMS Vernon is envisaged in the next 18 months.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what intention his Department has for the future use of HMS Vernon.

Mr. Lee: The Army and Royal Navy diving training establishments are to be collocated at HMS Vernon from 1985. HMS Vernon is included in a current study of the navy's requirements for shore establishments in the Portsmouth area. It is unlikely that this will result in any change of function in the immediate future.

Warships

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the total space available in each type and class of Her Majesty's warships has been taken by accommodation and recreational space over the past 30 years; and how current Royal Navy warships compare in this way with those of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Lee: The figures requested are not readily available for all classes. However, data for major classes of surface warships currently in service, together with the NATO average and Soviet Krivak class for comparison purposes are as follows:

Class	Percentage of ship by volume for recreation and accommodation	Allocation of space per man (Sq. M)
Sheffield Class	26.7	3·43
Broadsword Class	23·8	4·25
Leander*	32·0	3·59
NATO Average	25·0	4·32
Krivak†	27·0	4·26

Notes:

* The Leander, being a steam ship, carries a larger crew for her size than other classes. Hence the higher proportion of the ship dedicated to accommodation, but lower allocation per man.

† What we know of other modern Soviet warship classes confirms these figures.

NATO (Improved Capability)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at their recent meeting discussed a move by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation towards the acquisition of improved capability for deep conventional counter-attack.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot add to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 11 December, at column 411.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the turnover log of the radio operator on HMS Conqueror is now in the possession of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: HMS Conqueror's radio operator's turnover notes are in the possession of my Department.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he is satisfied that all signals recorded as having been transmitted (a) from HMS Conqueror to Flag Officer Submarines and (b) from Flag Officer Submarines to HMS Conqueror were properly authorised during the period 1 to 4 May 1982;

(2) if, from the records now available to him, there is any evidence of unauthorised signals being sent (a) from HMS Conqueror to Flag Officer Submarines or (b) from Flag Officer Submarines to HMS Conqueror during the period 1 to 4 May 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 4 December 1984, c. 100]: No signal may be sent without the signature of a releasing officer. We are not aware of any signal sent without this authorisation.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether a permanent record of the movements of HMS Conqueror is made by the ship's internal navigation system.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 27 November 1984, c. 410]: A record of HMS Conqueror's position would have been maintained by taking readings from the ship's inertial navigation system. The record is not normally retained permanently but a portion of HMS Conqueror's record has been kept for analysis.

Mr. Brian Moss

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current posting in the Navy of Mr. Brian Moss, formerly coxswain of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Stanley: Chief Petty Officer Moss is a coxswain in the submarine service.

Lieutenant Sethia (Diary)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Lieutenant Sethia's diary was entered in HMS Conqueror's register of classified books.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department became aware of Lieutenant Sethia's diary.

Mr. Heseltine: Extracts, apparently from a diary of a member of HMS Conqueror's crew, were published on a number of occasions from 16 April 1984 onwards. The Ministry of Defence conducted an internal inquiry at the time to try to identify the diarist but failed to do so. It was only on 7 November 1984 that a copy of a diary came into the possession of the Department. I understand that inquiries into the matter are still continuing, and it would not be right for me to say any more about it at this stage.

Falkland Islands

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the number, average gross registered tonnage, type and countries of origin of fishing vessels operating in 1984 on fishing grounds within 150 miles of the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Stanley: During 1984 the daily average number of fishing vessels detected within the Falkland Islands protection zone has usually varied between 40 and 60. Vessels entering the zone have been registered in the Soviet Union, Poland, Japan, Taiwan, German Democratic Republic, Federal Republic of Germany, Spain, Italy, Bulgaria, Denmark, Finland, Sweden, Liberia, Norway, Philippines and Panama. We do not record the precise type or gross tonnage of such fishing vessels generally.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there has been an increase in the number of fishing vessels operating within 150 miles of the Falkland Islands since July 1982.

Mr. Stanley: Information is available only from December 1982. The number of vessels fishing within the 150-mile Falkland Islands protection zone has remained of the same order of magnitude over the past two years.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the procedure for making a change in the rules of engagement during the Falklands campaign.

Mr. Heseltine: The higher management of the Falklands crisis was conducted by a small group of Ministers chaired by the Prime Minister. Changes in the rules of engagement were normally made by this body, in the light of military and other advice.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions during the Falklands campaign the rules of engagement were altered.

Mr. Heseltine: Often. I am preparing advice for the Foreign Affairs Committee on this subject.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the right hon. Sir John Nott, since 1 July 1983, has had access to documents relating to changes in the rules of engagement for the Falklands campaign to which he would have had ready access when he was a member of the War Cabinet.

Mr. Heseltine: I understand that Sir John Nott explained the extent of his knowledge of events when he gave evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee on 5 December. I have nothing to add to what he said then.

Argentina (Skyhawk Aircraft)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for British force levels in the south Atlantic of the acquisition by Argentina of Skyhawk naval aircraft.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the answer of my hon. Friend the then Minister for Defence Procurement on 23 July 1984 at column 535.

Chile (Military Facilities)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Royal Navy ships and (b) British military aircraft have made use of Chilean facilities at (i) Punta Arenas and (ii) Teniente Marsh on King George Island in the last 12 months.

Mr. Lee: No Royal Navy ships or British military aircraft have visited Punta Arenas during the last 12 months. An RAF Hercules used the Chilean antarctic base at Tiniente Ridolfo March Martin on 23 February 1984 to evacuate a casualty from HMS Endurance, and HMS Endurance herself paid a routine call at the base on 29 February.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence at what time Admiral Woodward learned of the visual contact which HMS Conqueror had established with the General Belgrano.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 433]: HMS Conqueror's signal reporting the sighting of the General Belgrano was relayed to Admiral Woodward on the afternoon of 1 May 1982.

Wessex Helicopter

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the airworthiness of the Wessex helicopter.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence what aircraft will replace the Wessex helicopter; and when it will commence active service.

Mr. Butler: No decisions have yet been taken about the aircraft type or in-service date of a replacement for the Wessex helicopter.

RAF Trainer

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make the placing of specific orders with United Kingdom firms by those countries which may supply the new Royal Air Force trainer his only criterion for judging potential offsets, to the exclusion of potential orders from the countries concerned.

Mr. Lee: The decision on a new RAF trainer will take account not only of performance and costs but also of the industrial proposals submitted by the contending firms. In this regard it is important to note that the tenders for the three foreign-designed aircraft all propose that substantial amounts of work would be undertaken in the United Kingdom. However, the wider aspects of potential benefit to British industry will also be taken into consideration.

Conventional Forces (Central Europe)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the relative balance of conventional forces in central Europe has changed in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's favour since 1980.

Mr. Lee: In numercial terms, the relative balance of conventional forces on the central front has remained broadly unchanged since 1980. Over that period the Warsaw pact has maintained its substantial numerical superiority in tanks, artillery pieces and fixed-wing tactical aircraft.

SCOTLAND

Mortality Rates

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current infant mortality rates for each social class in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The information for 1983 is contained in table D1.6 of the annual report of the Registrar General for Scotland for that year, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current standardised mortality rates for each social class in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Occupational mortality studies are restricted to years close to census years because of the use which is made of census information. As I said in answer to a previous question from the hon. Member on 30 November, at column 610, information for 1979-83 will be published in due course.

Youth Training Projects (Accidents)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the number of deaths and serious accidents sustained on youth training scheme propects in Dundee and Tayside to date.

Mr. Allan Stewart: For the period 1 April 1983 to 30 September 1984 there were no deaths and one major injury, which was sustained in Dundee.

Note: MSC accident figures for YTS are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980.

Teachers (Pay)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will shortly be making a statement on the request by Scottish teachers' unions for an independent pay review body.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend on 11 December 1984, at columns 399-400, to my hon. Friend, the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth).

Sexual Assaults

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the guidelines for the police on the investigation of sexual assaults are to be issued to the police authorities.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Home and Health Department will shortly seek the views of women's organisations on a draft of revised guidance to the police on the investigation of complaints of sexual assault. The final version of the guidance, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House, will be issued to the police when the consultation process has been completed.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy, when announcing the sales of Forestry Commission land in the Official Report, to indicate the location of such sales more precisely and to include the species composition of each wood.

Mr. John MacKay: Lists of properties sold by the Forestry Commission have been published in the Official Report from time to time. The latest list, showing the position to 21 October 1984, was contained in my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on 4 December 1984, at columns 140-50. In order to meet the hon. Member's request, any lists published in the Official Report of properties sold since that date will include in the case of a woodland an Ordnance Survey grid reference and an indication of whether it consists mainly of broadleaves or of conifers.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what steps the Forestry Commission takes to seek to ensure that broadleaved woodlands under its care are not converted to conifer plantations after sales into private hands;

(2) what steps the Forestry Commission takes to ensure that broadleaved woodlands under its care are not sold to agricultural interests for clear-felling.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission does not place constraints of this nature on the sale of broadleaved woodlands. However, apart from a number of statutory exceptions, the clear-felling of trees of more than 8 centimetres (3 in) in diameter requires a licence from the commission, whose policy rests on a general presumption in favour of broadleaved woodland normally being replanted with broadleaved trees after felling.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the Forestry Commission's policy regarding public access to woods which are consequently sold into private ownership.

Mr. John MacKay: When a wood is sold by the Forestry Commission the question of public access is one for the new owner. Public rights of way are not affected by changes in ownership.

Police Operation, Blindwells, East Lothian

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the Lothian and Borders police on the number of police officers and vehicles which were deployed at Blindwells, East Lothian, on the morning of 10 December; what was the cost of this police operation; and what was the purpose of the blocking of traffic on the Tranent-Meadowmill road on that occasion.

Mr. Ancram: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Rural Bus Services

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete the details of the scheme for the allocation of funds for transitional difficulties in rural areas arising from the White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. Ancram: In due course.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the range of fines imposed upon persons convicted of offences related to activities during the miners' dispute for (a) breach of the peace where it is a first offence, (b) vandalism and (c) reckless conduct.

Mr. Ancram: I understand that in the period to 16 November 1984 fines have been imposed for charges of breach of the peace related to the miners' dispute ranging from £1 to £750 — no information is available on whether these charges were first offences — and that fines for charges of vandalism related to the miners' dispute have ranged from £20 — for vandalism and breach of the peace—to £100. I also understand that no fines were imposed for reckless conduct related to the miners' dispute in this period.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for legal aid have been made by persons charged with offences related to picketing during the miners' dispute; how many have been accepted; and if he will list the figures for each area.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many complaints have been made against the police in relation to activities during the course of the miners' dispute; and how many complaints have been upheld.

Mr. Ancram: I understand that 23 such complaints have been received by the police. Of these, 10 are currently being investigated by the procurator fiscal or the police force concerned. No criminal or disciplinary charges have been brought following investigation of the others.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miners charged with offences related to picketing during the miners' dispute have (a) been refused bail and (b) had bail conditions imposed upon them which prevent them from visiting any premises or place for the purpose of picketing or demonstrating in connection with the current trade dispute other than peacefully to picket or demonstrate at their usual place of employment.

Mr. Ancram: For the first part of his question, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 5 December, at columns 346-47, by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang). For the second part, information on the imposition of any special conditions of bail is not available centrally.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the cost of policing during the miners' dispute; and what is his estimate of the cost for each police authority area.

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out in the following table:

Police authority area	Estimated cost to mid-November 1984 (£'000)
Central	144
Dumfries and Galloway	Nil
Fife	350
Grampian	Nil
Lothian and Borders	1,350
Northern	Nil
Strathclyde	1,910
Tayside	65
Total	3,819

Note: These figures represent the extra costs incurred during the miners' dispute.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps have been taken by chief constables to enable pickets to communicate information to drivers of vehicles.

Mr. Ancram: I understand that, although practice varies in the light of particular circumstances, the police normally seek to allow a limited number of pickets the opportunity to indicate to drivers their wish to communicate information to them. This accords with the code of practice on picketing. There is no obligation on drivers to receive such information if they do not wish to do so, and pickets have no right under the law to stop drivers, or have them stopped, for this purpose.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the cumulative numbers of police officers who have been involved in activities associated with the current miners' strike; and if he will list the figure as a proportion of the total police force.

Mr. Ancram: The information needed for any meaningful estimate of the kind requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Police (Riot Training)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of police officers who have undergone riot training.

Mr. Ancram: I estimate, on the basis of information provided by chief constables, that about 6,000 police officers in Scotland have undergone basic or further training in the use of protective equipment or other aspects of handling public disorder.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Aerial Crop Spraying

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list his current powers to control aerial crop spraying.

Mrs. Fenner: We have no powers currently to control aerial spraying, but under the Pesticides Safety Precautions Scheme (PSPS), which is jointly administered by my Department, the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of the Environment, the Health and Safety Executive and responsible Departments for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, Ministers consider the suitability of chemicals for aerial application. Only certain less toxic pesticides are cleared for application from the air. However, controls over aerial crop spraying are exercised by the Civil Aviation Authority under article 40 of the Air Navigation Order 1980. In addition, the Government are seeking powers in the Food and Environment Protection Bill to control the supply and use of pesticides. These powers would be sufficiently broad to allow the imposition of environmental safety conditions on aerial application. They would thus complement current controls.

Forestry

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the area of land newly afforested since 1980 to the latest available date in England, making a distinction between coniferous plantations and other forestry schemes.

Mrs. Fenner: Planting statistics are published by the Forestry Commission in its annual reports. During the period 1 April 1980 to 31 March 1984, a total of 6,548 hectares of new planting—4,927 hectares of conifers and 1,621 hectares of broadleaves—was carried out in England by the Forestry Commission and by the private sector with the aid of grants from the commission.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the area of land newly afforested since January 1980 to the latest available date in England; and if he will indicate the proportions planted by the Forestry Commission and private landowners, respectively.

Mrs. Fenner: Planting figures are compiled centrally on the basis of financial years beginning 1 April. During the period 1 April 1980 to 31 March 1984, a total of 6,548 hectares of new planting was undertaken in England, of which 1,854 hectares were planted by the Forestry Commission and 4,694 hectares by the private sector with the aid of grants from the commission.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why it is the policy of the Forestry Commission not to inform county councils of sales of woodlands in their own counties.

Mrs. Fenner: This information is already available to county councils and other bodies through the regular notices of possible woodland sales that the Forestry Commission places in the Estates Gazette. These notices, which are given in advance of general advertising, cover woodlands of five hectares and over and those smaller woodlands in respect of which there is a known conservation or amenity interest.

Wheat

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average on-farm selling price of wheat in the United Kingdom for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 to date.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Weighted average ex-farm price of wheat in the United Kingdom (£/tonne)

Year
1979	95·92
1980	99·30
1981	108·92
1982	113·74
1983	124·81

The average for January to September 1984, the latest period for which detailed data are available, is £119·60. For the year as a whole, I expect the average price to be lower as a result of low prices since the 1984 harvest. The weighted average ex-farm price of wheat for the week ending 6 December was £109·03 per tonne.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Winnick asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Walsall, North of 7 December, Official Report, column 295, where the other intervention stores for surplus EEC agriculture produce are sited; and what is the amount of food stored, broken down into each class of produce.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Agriculture and Horticulture (Grants)

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the grants, by category, which are available to the agricultural and horticultural industries from Government funds, and the total sums paid by category in 1983.

Mr. Jopling: The information cannot readily be provided on a calendar year basis, but the grants available to the agriculture and horticulture industries and the total sums paid under each scheme in 1983-84 are set out in the Appropriation Accounts for

Class III Vote 2
(Volume 3: HC614-III published on 29 October 1984, covering England and Northern Ireland)
Class XV Vote 1
(Volume 10: HC614-X published on 30 October 1984, covering Scotland)
Class XVI Vote 2
(Volume 11: HC614-XI published on 30 October 1984, covering Wales)

This information was summarised on a United Kingdom basis in the reply given on 6 December to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter).

Fish Farms

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has of ecological damage to rivers caused by discharges from fish farms.

Mr. MacGregor: I am aware of a report by the Wessex water authority which suggests that fish farm discharges are responsible for changes in the population of invertebrate animals in rivers for a relatively short distance downstream of fish farms. I am not, however, aware of any evidence that these changes have caused significant ecological damage to the rivers concerned, nor of any evidence of such damage being caused by fish farms elsewhere.

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the existing pollution controls for fish farms.

Mr. MacGregor: I am satisfied that water authorities have sufficient statutory powers to control fish farm discharges.

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the grants available to fish farmers.

Mr. MacGregor: Fish farmers may be eligible for grants under the following schemes, of which the first two are specifically designed to assist fish farmers:

Scheme	Rate of Grant
Council Regulation (EEC) 2908/83: Construction, equipment or modernisation of fish farming installations	25 per cent.
Fish Farming (Financial Assistance) Scheme 1984	Up to 5 per cent.*
Council Regulation (EEC) 355/77: Processing and marketing of agricultural and fishery products	25 per cent.
UK Agricultural Products Processing and Marketing (Improvement Grant) Regulations 1977 and 1983	Up to 8 per cent.†
Agriculture and Horticulture Development Scheme	5 per cent. Standard Area 10 per cent. Less Favoured Area
Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Scheme	Up to 33⅓ per cent. formation costs Up to 75 per cent. surveys
Industrial Development Act 1982	Negotiable according to circumstances

* This scheme provides the necessary back-up grant for projects approved under Council Regulation (EEC) 2908/83.
† This scheme provides the necessary back-up grant for projects approved under Council Regulation (EEC) 355/77.

Beef and Lamb

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what change has taken place in consumer demand for beef and lamb, respectively, since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 436]: Information from the national food survey indicates that between the first three quarters of 1979 and the first three quarters of 1984 household consumption of beef and sheepmeat fell by 26 per cent. and 21 per cent., respectively.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the percentage change in the retail price of beef and lamb, respectively, since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 436]: Data collected for inclusion in the retail price index indicate that, between October 1979 and October 1984, the average retail price of beef and sheepmeat increased by 37 per cent. and 25 per cent., respectively. Over the same period the retail price index increased by 52 per cent.

Food and Environment Protection Bill

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many meetings either he or members of his Department have had with representatives of the British Agriculture Association to discuss the Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords].

Mrs. Fenner: Officials of my Department have met representatives of the British Agrochemicals Association three times.

Research

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will give figures for public expenditure on research into (a) integrated pest management, (b) electrostatic spraying, (c) controlled droplet application and (d) pesticide toxicology, chemistry and efficacy, in each case for each year since 1970, and the estimated expenditure in each case for the future.

Mrs. Fenner: The information for 1983-84 is as follows:

	£ million
Estimated expenditure on research into
(a) Integrated pest management*	†2·20
(b) Electrostatic spraying‡	1·05
(c) Controlled droplet application‡
(d) Pesticide toxicology, chemistry and efficacy	4·90
Totals	8·15

* The figures for integrated pest management include work on the development of non-chemical methods of control, such as favouring populations of natural predators of pests. They also include work on forecasting disease and pest development and the identification of thresholds of development at which it is economic to apply chemical treatments in an attempt to reduce the number of times pesticides might be applied.

† The figure may be an underestimate. Other work done within commodity commissions cannot easily be extracted from general crop protection studies.

‡ MAFF, in its classification of research, does not differentiate between electrostatic sprayers and controlled droplet applicators. both employ controlled droplet techniques.

Information for earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Work in future years will be determined by the needs of the Ministry and the agriculture and horticulture industries.

Herring Quotas (North Sea)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers of the European Community held on 10 and 11 December in relation to the herring quotas in the North sea and other fisheries matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Council of Fisheries Ministers did not meet on 10 or 11 December, but it is now expected to meet on 19 December.

EC (Expenditure Totals)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how planned expenditure totals in the common agricultural policy in 1984-85 and 1985-86 differ; and what are the reasons for the change in expenditure plans.

Mr. Jopling: The Community budget is operated on a calendar year basis. The provision for expenditure under the common agricultural policy in 1984 is 19,146 million ecu. The 1985 budget has not yet been adopted.

Mr. Renton: We are aware of the concern about the depletion of fishing stocks in the area. We are actively considering the possibility of establishing an exclusive fisheries limit around the Falkland Islands, in which conservation would be an important element. But as the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs recognise in its report, this raises a number of complex issues. No decisions have yet been taken.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the tonnage, value and species of fish harvested in the Falkland Islands waters in 1983.

Mr. Renton: The specific information requested is not available. Fisheries statistics covering the entire south Atlantic area will not be available for some time.

British Antartic Base, Adelaide Island

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the transfer to Chile of the British Antartic base at Adelaide Island.

Mr. Renton: Adelaide station is an abandoned Antarctic base whose facilities were owned by the Natural Environmental Research Council and for which it had no further use. We therefore agreed to a proposal from the Chilean Antarctic Institute that Chile might use and assume responsibility for these facilities, within the framework of article IV of the Antarctic treaty.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with the Government of Chile about the implications of the transfer of the Adelaide Island base to Chile on territorial claims for the neighbouring area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Chile has accepted that its assumption of responsibility for the facilities at Adelaide station is within the framework of the provisions of the Antarctic Treaty and, in particular, of article IV. We do not consider that British sovereignty over the British Antarctic territory is in any way prejudiced by this arrangement.

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff of Government Communications Headquarters are being considered for transfer to other posts on the grounds of their refusal to give up union membership; how many staff have been transferred to other posts; by what date he expects there to be no union members employed at the headquarters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Transfers are being sought for 71 staff at GCHQ who have so far not accepted the revised terms and conditions of service introduced there on 25 January 1984. Ten staff have already been transferred to other posts in the Civil Service.

The decision of the House of Lords on 22 November confirms that the revised conditions of service at GCHQ are valid. It is our intention that these should be fully implemented. GCHQ will endeavour to find alternative posts within the Civil Service for those who do not wish to remain at GCHQ under the new conditions. There may be some for whom suitable positions cannot be found and they will be offered premature retirement on redundancy terms. This process may take some time and it is not possible to predict when it will be completed.

Gibraltar

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure that the accession of Spain to the EEC does not reduce the wage rates or standards of living of people in Gibraltar.

Mr. Renton: We have given full consideration to the impact on Gibraltar of Spanish accession to the European Community. We believe that the re-establishment of closer economic relations following the opening of the frontier and Spanish accession will be beneficial to the people of Gibraltar.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 14 December 1984

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Photocopying

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that the regulations governing the use by research assistants of the photocopier in the Upper Committee Corridor are observed;

(2) if he is satisfied that the present provision of photocopying facilities is adequate to meet the needs of right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the matter is to be considered in the near future by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee.

I am sure that the Sub-Committee will take account of any representations made to it.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Research Expenditure

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the total projected Government expenditure for 1985 for research into (a) contraceptive, (b) abortion and (c) sterilisation techniques;

(2) what has been the total Government expenditure on research into (a) contraceptive, (b) abortion and (c) sterilisation techniques in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. The council's total expenditure on research projects which have areas of relevance to contraceptive, abortion and sterilisation techniques in each of the past four years is as follows:

1980-81	979,320
1981-82	1,103,992
1982-83	1,279,409
1983-84	1,529,178

The figures include the total cost of each project that involves work in the areas concerned, not only that part of each project which is directly relevant to the techniques.

I understand that the council does not have comparable figures for the years prior to 1980-81, neither can it produce an estimate of its expenditure in this field in 1985-86. The latter will depend on the research grant applications received by the council and on its decisions about whether to support them. The council is always ready to consider soundly based proposals for new research.

Research work relevant to these techniques is also carried out in universities and medical schools, financed from the block grant to universities allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee and from other sources. Details are not available.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mrs. Norah McCabe

Mr. Hume asked the Attorney-General whether, in the light of the inquest findings in the case of Mrs. Norah McCabe and the new evidence which has come to light, he will ask the Director of Public Prosecutions to reopen investigations into the case.

The Attorney-General: No. After the inquest, the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland reconsidered this case in the light of the evidence given at the inquest and the inquest findings and of all the other evidence now available, as described in the answer which my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 7 December. As a result of that reconsideration, the Director reaffirmed his earlier conclusion that the evidence available did not warrant the institution of proceedings against any person in respect of Mrs. McCabe's death. He has discussed the case with me and I am satisfied that that decision is correct.

NUM Sequestrators (Costs)

Mr. John Morris asked the Attorney-General what statutory authority he proposes to seek for the indemnity granted to Price Waterhouse in respect of costs incurred in its role as sequestrators of the assets of the National Union of Mineworkers.

The Attorney-General: The Crown has granted the indemnity under its common law power, but Parliament is being asked to make token provision in the Consolidated Fund Bill in respect of the contingent liability assumed under the indemnity. Any payments under the indemnity would require further provision in a subsequent Consolidated Fund Act.

Coal Industry Dispute (Legal Aid)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Attorney-General how many applications have been made by persons charged with offences related to picketing during the miners' dispute for legal aid; and how many have been accepted; and if he will list the figures in each area.

The Attorney-General: The statistics collected do not relate applications for legal aid to alleged offences. The information requested could not be obtained, except at disproportionate cost.

WALES

School Meals

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the amount of subsidy paid per annum to provide school meals in Wales; and what proportion is paid to subsidise the cost of midday meals to boarding pupils.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The net recurrent cost of the school meals service for maintained schools in Wales is provisionally estimated to have been £27·6

Industrial Training Boards and Skillcentres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what research has been (a) commissioned, (b) completed and (c) published at the instigation of himself or the Manpower Services Commission since 1979 into the role of industrial training boards, including the effectiveness of voluntary arrangements to replace the functions of former statutory industrial training boards; and if he will give a progress report of all such research not yet published and a list of all such research;

(2) how many proposals for new courses and projects have been (a) made and (b) approved in the last two years in respect of the skillcentres that have been proposed for closure;

(3) what information he has about the profitability of the skillcentres that have been proposed for closure.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Average Earnings

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list his Department's latest estimates of average gross weekly earnings of full-time workers in Wales, England, Scotland, and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest figures on the average earnings of full-time adult employees working a full week relate to April 1984. Separate details for Wales, for England, for Scotland and for Great Britain are given in tables 12 and 13 of New Earnings Survey 1984, part A, a copy of which is in the Library. Comparable 1984 figures for the United Kingdom are not yet available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the following age categories are unemployed in Liverpool: 16 to 17, 17 to 18, 18 to 19, 19 to 20, 20 to 21, 21 to 22, 22 to 23, 23 to 24 and 24 to 25 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on unemployment in the 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 to 24 years age groups for the old Liverpool travel-to-work area is available in the House of Commons Library. Corresponding information for the new travel-to-work areas will become available next year.

Work Force (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase or decrease in the work force from 1979 to 1984 in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America, (c) West Germany, (d) France and (e) Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information is in respect of total civilian employment, and is shown in the following table.

Change in civilian employment, 1979 quarter 2 to 1984 quarter 2

	'000
United Kingdom	−1,352
United States	+6,734
West Germany	−896
France*	−341
Japan†	+2,803

* 1978 quarter 4 to 1983 quarter 4. Includes persons in professional training.

† Includes armed forces.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what are the latest available figures for the number of persons charged with offences related to picketing during the miners' dispute, the numbers of persons against whom proceedings have been taken, the numbers of persons convicted, and in each case, the offences with which persons have been charged.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The most readily available information on the number of persons arrested, proceeded against by procurators fiscal and convicted in respect of offences arising out of the present miners' dispute is as follows.

In the period to 7 December1984, 1,406 persons have been arrested in connection with such offences; in the period to 28 November 1984, 827 persons have been proceeded against by procurators fiscal and 208 persons have been convicted in respect of such offences. Information on the nature of offences in respect of which charges have been brought by procurators fiscal and persons have been convicted is contained in my replies given to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 4 December 1984 at columns 102-103.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he has issued any guidance to chief constables about the use of their powers which enable them to seek to limit the number of people picketing at any particular entry to a place of work.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Neither my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate nor I have issued any such guidance to chief constables.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Prisoners

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the actual remand population of each remand centre for young prisoners aged (a) 15 to 16 years and (b) 17 to 21 years, on the last day of November 1983, May 1984, August 1984, September 1984 and October 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information is given in the following table:

*Untried and convicted unsentenced prisoners aged 15 and under 21 in remand centres in England and Wales at month end: by age and remand centre

Young Persons (Remand)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young persons, male and female, aged (a) 15 to 16 years and (b) 17 to 21 years have been held on remand in adult establishments so far during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current certifiable normal accommodation for all male and female youth custody establishments in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The certified normal accommodation (CNA) for youth custody centres is as follows:

	Number

Youth custody trainees are also held in the young offenders prison at Chelmsford (CNA for sentenced inmates 173) and in smaller units, for which CNA is not available separately, in other adult prisons and remand centres.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the actual population of all youth custody establishments in England and Wales on the last day of November 1983, May 1984, August 1984, September 1984 and November 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information is given in the following table:

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many young males and females aged between 15 and 21 years were being held in young prisoner wings of adult prisons on the last day of November 1983, May 1984, August 1984, September 1984 and November 1984;

(2) how many young males and females aged between 15 and 21 were being held in other adult prisons on the last day of November 1983, May 1984, August 1984, September 1984 and November 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is given in the following table:

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of sentence for young males and females sentenced to periods of youth custody aged between (a) 15 and 16 years, (b) 16 and 17 years and (c) 17 to 21 years during the 12 months following the implementation of part I, sections 1 to 10 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the following table. Some information was also published in paragraph 7.22 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales 1983" (Cmnd. 9349). Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Detention Centres (Statistics)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many young males aged between 14 and 21 years were sentenced to periods in detention centres in the year following the implementation of part I, sections 1 to 10, of the Criminal Justice Act 1982;

(2) how many young males and females aged between 15 and 21 years were sentenced to periods of youth custody in the year following the implementation of part I, sections 1 to 10, of the Criminal Justice Act 1982;

(3) if he will produce comparative statistical tables outlining the number of youths sentenced to periods of detention centre and imprisonment for the last two years.

Mr. Mellor: The available information on sentencing in 1982 and 1983 is published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table S1.1(A) of Vol. 1 for magistrates' courts and table S2.1(A) for the Crown court) and for indictable offences is summarised in table 7A of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349). My right hon. and learned Friend plans to publish soon a statistical bulletin giving information on the use of the new sentencing structure for young offenders in the first half of 1984.

Entry Certificates

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the event of introduction of fees for entry certificates, he will instruct immigration officers in cases where prior entry clearance is optional, to decide whether to admit notwithstanding any absence of prior entry clearance.

Mr. Waddington: The introduction of a fee for entry certificates will not affect the examination of passengers by immigration officers in accordance with the immigration rules.

Police and Fire Services

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to encourage the extension of privatisation of services within the police and fire services.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes that police and fire authorities will consider the scope for contracting out support services in connection with the theme of value for money contained in his speech on 7 November to the Association of County Councils, copies of which have been deposited with the Library of the House.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he uses to approve capital projects such as centralised vehicle repair workshops within the police services.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The basic criterion applied is that of operational need. Thereafter, detailed project cost control procedures are applied to the actual design proposals.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he uses when considering whether or not to approve capital projects, such as centralised command and control systems, within the police forces.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In considering proposals for major equipment by the Metropolitan police, my right hon. and learned Friend, as police authority, expects to see an investment appraisal which sets out the objectives; the options which have been considered; the costs and benefits of each option; an assessment of the effect on police and civilian manpower; purchasing and financing proposals; and other relevant considerations.

As for such purchases by other forces in England and Wales, the Department has asked to be informed of major police computer projects and provides guidance to chief officers and police authorities as appropriate. Further guidance will shortly be issued on the considerations to be taken into account in order to ensure that value for money is obtained.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent deployments of the Metropolitan police in connection with the miners' strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief officers of the aided forces are responsible for the deployment of officers provided under the mutual aid arrangements.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the cumulative numbers of police officers who have been involved in activities associated with the current miners' strike; and if he will list the figure as a proportion of the total police force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not available centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest available figures for the numbers of persons charged with offences relating to picketing during the miners' dispute, the numbers of persons against whom proceedings have been taken, the numbers of persons convicted, and, in each case, the offences with which persons have been charged.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the period from 13 March to 11 December inclusive, 7,314 people were charged with offences in connection with the miners' dispute. Of those, 3,903 cases were dealt with by the courts during the same period, 3,040 of which resulted in convictions. The information available centrally about the offences for which charges were brought during this period is as follows:

Offence	Number of charges
Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 (conduct conducive to a breach of the peace)	3,801
Obstructing a police constable	1,616
Obstruction of the highway	619

Assaulting a police constable	312
Assault occasioning actual bodily harm	348
Assault occasioning grievous bodily harm	37
Theft	197
Resisting arrest	18
Offensive weapons	47
Section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875 (intimidation)	270
Burglary	29
Handling stolen property	1
Drug offence	1
Breach of the peace	168
Breach of bail conditions	30

Incitement	1
Reckless driving	15
Threats/conspiracy to cause damage	12
Explosives offence	3
Threats to kill	3
Unlawful imprisonment	2
Other offences	205
Total	9,422

The number of charges is higher than the number of people charged because some people were charged with more than one offence.

Information about the offences of which persons were convicted is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the range of fines imposed upon persons convicted of offences related to activities during the miners' dispute for (a) breach of the peace, (b) vandalism and (c) reckless conduct in all cases where these have been first offences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Between 13 March and 11 December inclusive, a total of 1,937 fines were imposed following convictions for offences committed in connection with the miners' dispute. The range of fines was as follows:

	Number
Under £10	6
£10-£24	151
£25-£49	292
£50-£74	360
£75-£99	483
£100-£149	391
£150-£199	88
£200 and above	166

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been made against the police in relation to activities during the course of the miners's dispute; and how many complaints have been upheld.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many miners, charged with offences related to picketing during the miners' dispute, have (a) been refused bail and (b) had bail conditions imposed upon them which prevent them from visiting any premises or place for the purpose of picketing or demonstrating in connection with the current trade dispute other than peacefully to picket or demonstrate at their usual place of employment.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the cost of policing during the miners' dispute; and what is his estimate of the cost for each police authority area.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give the actual or estimated cost to date of policing the dispute between the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are not keeping a running total of the costs. For the purpose of the winter Supplementary Estimate for Class IX Vote 6, presented to the House on 20 November, we have estimated that the additional expenditure up to the end of October would be about £140 million. We have made no estimate of the costs in each police area. The Home Office has so far paid to police authorities in England and Wales advances of police grant and of the special payment which my right hon. and learned Friend is making available on expenditure totalling £103 million.

Isle of Man (Fisheries Meeting)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department by which Department the interests of the Northern Ireland fishing industry were represented at the meeting of the joint standing committee on common interests of the Isle of Man and the United Kingdom in the Isle of Man of 5 December.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Fishery issues were not on the agenda; there was therefore no requirement for any such representation.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what fisheries matters were discussed at the recent joint standing committee in the Isle of Man.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None.

Police (Establishment)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for which police authorities in the six metropolitan county areas the actual manpower numbers are (a) below established and (b) above established levels.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The position on 31 October 1984 was as follows:

Police authority	Authorised police establishment	Actual strength
(a) Below authorised establishment
Greater Manchester	6,943	6,810
Northumbria	3,357	3,354
South Yorkshire	2,872	2,844
West Midlands	6,684	6,569
West Yorkshire	5,154	5,060
(b) Above authorised establishment
Merseyside	*4,607	4,620

* 26 posts supernumary to the authorised police establishment have been approved, bringing the total number of authorised posts to 4,633.

Prevention of Terrorism (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why the statistics on the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974, 1976 and 1984, published after 30 April, no longer include in table 3 (persons detained under the Acts by police force area), the numbers of persons detained in individual police districts except for the Metropolitan and Merseyside area in England and for Dumfries and Galloway in Scotland; why he has ceased to publish any details of the extensions of detention granted in any police districts; and whether he will ensure resumption of publication of this information in the future and provide it for the two intervening quarters for which information has not been published;

(2) if he will make a statement as to why his Department, in the two most recent editions of statistics on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts, has ceased to provide the information hitherto included under table 4 (persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts and charged with offences under these Acts by section under which charged and outcome), and under table 5 (persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts and charged only with criminal offences other than under the Acts (a) by principal offence and (b) where charged and outcome of charge); and if he will ensure that publication of these tables is resumed in the fourth quarter of 1984 and that the tables giving relevant information for the operation of the Act in the intervening quarters for which information has not been published will be made available;

(3) if he will again commence publication of statistics of extensions of detention granted under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Information on extensions of detention continues to be published in tables 1 and 2 of the quarterly statistical bulletin on the operation of the prevention of terrorism legislation. The more detailed information referred to is no longer published regularly each quarter because of the small numbers involved. As stated in note 8 to the latest statistical bulletin, issued on 25 October 1984 (No. 25/84), it is planned to publish the details of offences and sentencing of persons detained under the Acts and subsequently charged with offences in the fourth quarter bulletin in January 1985. This bulletin will also contain details on the geographical distribution of detentions and extensions of detention.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the reasons for the appearance in the two most recent statistical bulletins on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts of a category of persons examined for up to 12 hours which are not included in persons detained under the Acts; when persons were first so examined but not detained; if he will make available the figures for persons examined but not detained under the Acts for prior periods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: This information was included in statistical bulletins Nos. 17/84 and 25/84 in response to the recommendation in paragraph 145 of Earl Jellicoe's report "Review of the Operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976" (Cmnd. 8803). Information on persons examined for more than an hour but not detained is not available before 27 March 1984, when the supplemental provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 came into force.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a table showing the ratio between the number of persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts from 29 November 1974 to 31 December 1983 to the number of such persons being subject to applications for extensions of detention for each police force area; what conclusions he draws between differences in these ratios for different police force areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The proportion of detentions for which an extension was granted in the period 29 November 1974 to 31 December 1983 can be calculated, by police force area, from table 2 of Home Office statistical bulletin issue 2/84. Such percentages vary widely from one police force area to another because the type of cases involved may vary widely. All extensions of detention have to be approved by the Secretary of State and applications from all police force areas are dealt with on the same basis.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the operation of schedule 3 and articles 6 and 8 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Supplementary Provisions) Order 1984, with particular reference to the number of custodial sentences imposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Information about the sentences of those convicted of offences under the prevention of terrorism legislation during 1984 will be included in a statistical bulletin to be published in January.

Public Order Act 1936

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to complete his review of the Public Order Act 1936.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to complete his review of the Public Order Act 1936 and related legislation by the end of this year.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which aspects of activities during the course of the present miners' dispute are now the subject of investigation associated with his review of the Public Order Act 1936.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In my right hon. and learned Friend's review, and in his consideration of the Law Commission's report on offences against public order, he is naturally taking account of the disorder and violence which has occurred during the miners' dispute.

Picketing

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has issued any guidance to chief constables about the use of their powers enabling them to seek to limit the number of people picketing at any particular entry to a place of work.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. I am satisfied that chief officers of police are aware of the relevant law and police powers, to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred in his statement on picketing at collieries on 15 March, at columns 512-21, and of which my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General gave a full account in his reply on 26 March, at columns 21-22, to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen).

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken by chief constables to enable pickets to communicate information to drivers of vehicles.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that the practice of the police has varied according to local circumstances. But in any event there is no obligation on drivers to stop to receive such information if they do not wish to do so.

Police (Riot Training)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of police officers who have undergone riot training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to the hon. Member.

A360 (Road Block)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the appropriate chief constable as to the purpose of the road block on the A360 by the Westdown camp on the Tilshead to West Lanington road on 11 December; how many cars were stopped; whey they were stopped; on whose authority; with what result; and why cars of Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament members were not allowed to proceed along the road.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Wiltshire tells me that no police road blocks were operated on that stretch of road on that day.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to introduce the Bill to deal with interception of communications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: After Christmas; the Bill will be preceded by a White Paper setting out in detail its scope and content.

Lion Intoximeter 3000

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the percentage take-up of blood and urine tests by persons also tested with the Lion Intoximeter 3000; if he is satisfied with the take-up; what steps he is taking to increase the take-up; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the period 6 May to 31 December 1983 57 per cent. of those tested on the Lion Intoximeter who had readings in the range 40-50 microgrammes of alcohol to 100 millitres of breath went on to request a blood or urine test. We estimate, on the basis of available information, that around 60 per cent. of those tested on the intoximeter during the period 1 January 1984 to 15 April 1984 who had readings in this range requested a blood or urine test. In the period 15 April to 15 October a blood or urine test requested by 69 per cent. of those given evidential breath tests who had readings in the 40-50 microgrammes range, and by 37 per cent. of those given such tests who had readings over 50 microgrammes. The figures for this period include persons tested on both the Lion Intoximeter and the Camic Breath Analyser.

We will be examining these statistics in more detail, as well as other matters relating to evidential breath testing, when the full report of the six-month monitoring of evidential breath testing is available, and will then consider whether changes to present procedures would be desirable.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the final report on the accuracy of the Lion Intoximeter 3000 to be available; and when it is expected to be published.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We expect the report on the six-month monitoring of the operation of the Lion Intoximeter and the Camic Breath Analyser to be completed early in the new year and to be published shortly afterwards.

ENVIRONMENT

Greater Manchester

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the percentage of total local government net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester local authority area represented by expenditure by district councils on education, housing and social services.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The metropolitan district councils' 1984-85 budgeted net current expenditure on education—including school meals and milk—housing—non-housing revenue account—and social services—including personal social services and housing benefit—represented about 61 per cent. of all district and county council net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester area.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the actual amount of total local government net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester local authority area represented by expenditure by district councils on education, housing and social services.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The metropolitan district councils in Greater Manchester have budgeted in 1984-85 to spend about £772 million of net current expenditure on education—including school meals and milk—housing—non-housing revenue account—and social services—including personal social services and housing benefit.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the percentage of total local government net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester local authority area incurred by metropolitan district councils after deducting expenditure on education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The metropolitan district councils' 1984-85 budgeted net current expenditure on services other than education — that is education expenditure including school meals and milk — represented about 25 per cent. of all district and county council net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester area.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the actual amount of total local government net current expenditure in the Greater Manchester local authority area incurred by the metropolitan district councils after deducting expenditure on education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The metropolitan district councils in Greater Manchester have budgeted in 1984-85 to spend about £319 million of net current expenditure on services other than education—that is expenditure on education including school meals and milk.

Council House Sales

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by district, within English and Welsh county areas, details of sales of local authority dwellings to sitting tenants up to the latest convenient date; and if he will indicate the local authority housing stock in 1979-80 and the sales for each district as a percentage of that stock.

Mr. Gow: For details of the position in Wales I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. The following figures of English authorities' sales to sitting tenants from April 1979 to June 1984 include other council house sales up to March 1980. Since 1979 there have been other changes to the stock through new building and acquisitions and some transfers between authorities. An additional column shows the latest stock figures reported by authorities for 1 April 1984.

EC (Budget Discipline)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at which meetings of the European Economic Community Council of Agriculture Ministers in 1984 the financial guidelines on budget discipline have been discussed; and what was the result of each discussion.

Mr. Jopling: The principles of Community budgetary discipline, including specific controls on the growth of agricultural expenditure, were laid down by Heads of Government in the European Council. The detailed arrangements on how the agreement should be given effect through the Community's budget procedures were not discussed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers as they were mainly a matter for the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers. The resultant conclusions have been adopted in the name of the Council as a whole.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Entry Certificates

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements have been made to inform applicants for entry clearance of any charge for entry certificates; if charges will be levied on grant or on application; what extra staff time and other costs are estimated to be required in collection of fees; if people waiting in queues will be charged retrospectively; if charges will apply to minor children; and if where joint applications occur there will be one charge or two.

Mr. Renton: British missions overseas have been asked to give appropriate publicity to the introduction of the fee for an entry certificate. Charges will be levied on application. Extra staff time and other costs are expected to be negligible. Retrospective charges will not be levied. A charge will apply to a minor when travelling on a separate passport. Where dependants are included in the passport of a husband or parent and are travelling together, one fee will be charged.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if unsuccessful applicants for entry clearance will receive a refund of fees.

Mr. Renton: Yes.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if British overseas citizens and British dependent territories citizens will be charged fees for entry clearance.

Mr. Renton: Entry certificates issued to British overseas citizens and British Dependent Tegritories citizens will attract a fee.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when fees for entry certificates are to be introduced; what consultation he has undertaken with interested organisations; what consultation he has undertaken with the Governments of Commonwealth countries; what information has been issued; and to whom it has been issued.

Mr. Renton: Fees for entry certificates will be introduced from 1 January 1985. There was no consultation with outside bodies before the announcement to Parliament. Commonwealth Governments have been informed.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the introduction of fees for entry certificates will cause any delay for women and children applying for certificates of entitlement or passports.

Mr. Renton: No.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received opposing his proposals to introduce fees for entry certificates.

Mr. Renton: Representations on the matter have been made in the House. My Department has received letters from two Members of Parliament and from one immigrant organisation.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the appeal procedure he proposes, if fees are charged for entry certificates, for applicants who are refused clearance on the sole ground of failure to pay the fee.

Mr. Renton: Payment of the fee will be part of the process for applying for entry certificates. An appeal lies to an adjudicator against the refusal of an entry certificate only where an application has been duly made—section 13(2) of the Immigration Act 1971. No right of appeal exists in respect of any fee at present levied under the provisions of the consular fees order and it is not intended to introduce any additional appeal provisions.

Ethiopia

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have made representations to the Ethiopian Government about the denial of human rights in Ethiopia.

Mr. Rifkind: We have made continued representations to the Ethiopian authorities about human rights. I raised the issue both with Ethiopian Ministers during my visit to Addis Ababa in July and more recently with the Ethiopian ambassador in London. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development also raised the matter during his visit to Addis Ababa last month.

Treaty Obligations

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government take to ensure that treaty obligations entered into by Greece, Turkey and the United Kingdom under the treaty of Lausanne and more particularly the convention respecting the Thracian frontier and article 1(2) thereof, are observed.

Mr. Renton: We have no reason to believe that we are not adequately discharging any obligation imposed upon us by the treaty of Lausanne. The convention respecting the Thracian frontier was superseded by an agreement signed at Salonika on 31 July 1938, to which we are not a party.

Lemnos

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to those Greek forces now present on, or attached to, the island of Lemnos.

Mr. Renton: The information we have on Greek military dispositions comes to us in confidence as a NATO ally.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to Greece following the militarisation of the island of Lemnos by Greece.

Mr. Renton: None.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecom

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the cost to public funds of returning money to applicants for shares in British Telecom whose desired allocation was not met in full or not met at all.

Mr. Butcher: There is no net cost to public funds.

Computer Software (Export)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his meeting with the Computer Services Association on 14 December to discuss the impact of the new COCOM regulation on the export of software.

Mr. Channon: Officials of my Department met representatives of the Computer Services Association on 14 November and 14 December to discuss the details of the agreement reached in COCOM on future controls on exports of computer software of strategic importance and the arrangements for implementation. The views of industry representatives will be taken into account in drawing up the new licensing arrangements.

Brother Corporation

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what discussions have taken place between his Department, the Brother Corporation and various regional development authorities, about the siting of a Brother factory in the United Kingdom for the manufacture of typewriters; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many jobs would be directly or indirectly lost or threatened in Britain if the Brother Corporation were to abandon its plans to open up a new typewriter factory in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: My Department frequently holds discussions with Japanese companies which may be considering establishing United Kingdom manufacturing facilities, but such discussions remain confidential between the Department and the companies concerned.

Japanese Typewriters

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the Government's policy on current moves being considered by the EEC to take anti-dumping moves against Japanese typewriters.

Mr. Channon: The European Commission opened an anti-dumping investigation into imports of electronic typewriters from Japan on 24 March 1984 following a complaint by the Committee of European Typewriter Manufacturers. The investigation is now nearing completion: both producer and consumer interests have been consulted. It is understood that provisional remedies are to be announced shortly, and these will be studied carefully by my Department. At this stage, any proposals are confidential.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry precisely what share of the European regional development fund the Government anticipate the United Kingdom will receive from January 1985 in order to make financial provisions for public expenditure; and if any receipts over and above this level will be available for additional spending by local authorities.

Mr. Trippier: Anticipated United Kingdom receipts from the ERDF from 1985 will be shown in the public expenditure White Paper to be published early in the new year.

These receipts are related to commitments entered into by the Commission previously and can thus be estimated with reasonable accuracy. The question of unexpected receipts does not therefore arise.

EMPLOYMENT

Tourism

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will change the presentation of classes of employment in the Employment Gazette in order to show the number of people employed in tourism;

(2) if he will collect and publish accurate statistics on an annual basis, showing the number of people employed in the tourism industry in England.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the numbers of employees working in the industries which are most clearly related to tourism in Great Britain were given in the article on "Overseas travel and tourism" published in British Business on 9 November 1984 and will be updated quarterly. The figures are also regularly published in Employment Gazette and relate to total employment in the hotel and catering trades; in libraries, museums, art galleries and so on; and in sports and other recreational services. There are also many other industries which serve tourists, such as retail distribution, transport, banking and so on. Few of these industries are wholly devoted to tourism. It is not possible to distinguish that part of employment in these industries which is generated by tourism from other employment because businesses do not keep detailed records of the type of their customers. Nor would it be feasible to collect on a regular basis from tourists a detailed breakdown of their expenditure in these industries. It is therefore not possible to collect and publish accurate statistics of employment in tourism on an annual basis. However, the most reliable indication of trends is provided by the statistics now published in British Business which shows quarterly employment in the industries most heavily dependent on tourism.

Separate figures for England for the industries which are most clearly related to tourism are available only when the detailed census of employment is carried out. Figures for September 1981 were published in the supplement to the December 1983 issue of Employment Gazette. figures for September 1984 will be published in due course.

dioxide emissions in the United Kingdom since (a) 1970 and (b) 1980, has been due to changes in emissions from Central Electricity Generating Board power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave: Reductions in emissions from CEGB power stations from 1970 to date account for 11 per cent. of the total fall in emissions in that period

For reductions since 1980, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) on 12 December at column 503.

SOCIAL SERVICES

City Roads Detoxification Unit

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will continue the funding in 1985-86 of City Roads detoxification unit for young drug addicts.

Mr. John Patten: The general scheme for grants to voluntary organisations under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 is used for two main purposes: one is to help with national organisations' general costs; the other is to support specific projects for a specific period, usually limited to three years—this includes experimental or innovative local schemes of wider significance. The Department's grant to City Roads, which falls into the latter category, has already been extended exceptionally to six years, of which 1984-85 is the last. We are, however, considering an application from City Roads for a substantial capital grant towards the purchase and renovation of the building next to its existing premises. We await the views of the local statutory authorities on this application.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the composition of family practitioner committees from April 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: From 1 April 1985 family practitioner committees will normally comprise a chairman and 30 members.

The membership will include 15 members of the professions providing family practitioner services appointed from nominations received from local representative committees. There will be seven general medical and one ophthalmic medical practitioner, three dentists, two pharmacists and an ophthalmic and a dispensing optician. Four members will be appointed from nominations received from district health authorities, four from local authorities, and seven from nominations from other sources.

Each committee will include among its membership a nurse with community experience.

Grant Entitlement

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provisions his Department has made for the effective diaribution of his Department's leaflet NI 49/August 79 to those categories of people entitled to grant.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's leaflet NI 49 "Death Grant" is distributed via the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and the General Register Office for Scotland to registrars who are instructed to provide one copy to every private person who acts as informant at the registration of a death. The leaflet is also freely available from our local offices and from the Leaflets Unit, Government Buildings, Honeypot Lane, Stanmore, Middlesex HA17 1AY.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what expert advice he took on the level of patient compliance to be expected from the use of the British Pharmacopoeia formulations listed as prescribable under the National Health Service in his illustrative list;

(2) what estimate he has made of National Health Service resources likely to be wasted annually from 1 April 1985 through the prescribing of basic medicines which have a low record of patient compliance.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no reason to believe that there will be any significant change in the pattern of patient compliance from 1 April 1985.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance he proposes to give to retail pharmacists in explaining to their customers why, from 1 April 1985, they will not be able to obtain on National Health Service prescriptions the medicines they have been accustomed to receiving.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am discussing with the pharmaceutical profession how best patients should be informed and reassured that all essential medicines will continue to be available on the National Health Service.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultation he has initiated with the principals of the British hospice movement regarding his proposed limited list of drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government will welcome any suggestions made separately about specialised needs, and we have already received correspondence on this issue from individuals working in hospices. We also expect consultation with the medical profession generally to reflect views of the hospice movement.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his speech to the Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators on 11 December, he will list the drugs outside the scope of his proposed limited list which the pharmaceutical industry has claimed will no longer be available under the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The final list of drugs to remain available on the National Health Service in each of the groups covered by the limited list proposals will not be determined until our consultation with the professions and industry is complete. I welcome this opportunity to make it clear that, contrary to statements made elsewhere, our proposals do not affect NHS provision of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (ibuprofen and so on); the more powerful analgesics like pentazocine (Fortral) and dihydrocodeine tartrate (DF118); the high dose vitamins required to treat vitamin deficiency; or folic acid. These drugs will still be available for prescription under the National Health Service after 1 April 1985. We attach importance to consultation with the professions and the industry to ensure that no essential drug is omitted from the list.

Policy Studies Institute (Working Paper C)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he considers that his comments on the Policy Studies Institute working paper C would not be appropriate for publishing.

Mr. Newton: It has never been the practice to publish confidential comments passed to researchers.

NHS (Health Hazards)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration his Department has given to the GMBATU'S recent report on health hazards in the National Health Service; what action he is taking with regard to each of the report's findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Prescriptions

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors' prescriptions were inaccurately dispensed in the past year due to the inability of pharmacists to read the handwriting on them; and if his Department is considering any recommendations to reduce the number of incorrectly dispensed prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is a breach of his National Health Service terms of service for a pharmacist to dispense a prescription incorrectly. Where a pharmacist is not certain of a prescriber's intentions—for example, where the handwriting is not legible—he must check with the prescribing general practitioner. While I welcome any steps individual GPs can take to avoid the risk of confusion, I do not believe that, except perhaps in very isolated and wholly exceptional cases, prescriptions are incorrectly dispensed.

Regional Health Authorities (Rates of Pay)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance his Department has given to regional health authorities regarding the stipulation of rates of pay in contracts with contracting firms to which wages council agreements apply.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have told health authorities not to specify rates of pay in contract documents.

Nurses (Back Pain)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many working days were lost to the National Health Service due to back pain among nurses in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed information centrally.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the estimated numbers of supplementary benefit claimants living (a) in hostels or common lodging houses and (b) as boarders in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Information for 1979 to 1983—using provisional data for 1983—is given in the table. Data for 1984 have not yet been collected.

Contraceptive, Abortion and Sterilisation Services

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the projected National Health Service expenditure for 1985 on (a) contraceptive, (b) abortion and (c) sterilisation services;

(2) what has been the total National Health Service expenditure on the provision of (a) contraceptive, (b) abortion and (c) sterilisation services in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Precise details of the costs of contraceptive services provided through the National Health Service are not available though it is possible to identify the fees paid to general medical practitioners for the provision of these services, and to estimate the basic ingredient cost of the medicines and devices prescribed, and the costs of family planning clinics. Total expenditure on these is estimated to have been:

England

	£ millions cash
1975-76	19
1976-77	30
1977-78	32
1978-79	34
1979-80	40
1980-81	49
1981-82	55
1982-83	61
1983-84	67

Figures for earlier years are not available.
Our Department's costing returns do not identify expenditure on abortions and sterilisation services.
We do not allocate centrally funds for future years for any of these services. No projections are therefore possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by contraceptive technique of the numbers of patients in receipt of contraceptive services under the National Health Service for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is given in the table. We do not collect detailed statistics about the contraceptive techniques used by the patients of general medical practitioners.

Family Income

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list, using the latest information available to his Department, the number of families per 1,000 families not on supplementary benefit and having an income less than 100 per cent. of supplementary benefit in Wales, England, Scotland and in the various regions within England, and in the United Kingdom as a whole;

(2) if he will list the numbers of families per 1,000 families having an income less than (a) 110 per cent., (b) 120 per cent., (c) 130 per cent. and (d) 140 per cent. of supplementary benefit, including those receiving supplementary benefit, in Wales, England, Scotland and the various regions within England and in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Whitney: I regret not all the information is available. Estimates of numbers of low income families are available only for Great Britain. Separate figures for individual regions of England are not readily available nor are estimates of the number of families with an income of more than 120 per cent. but less than 130 per cent. of supplementary benefit level. The latest available information, which relates to 1981, is shown in the table.

Estimated number of families per thousand families with incomes at specific levels

Above supplementary benefit but less than 20 per cent. above	[80]	70	90	70

Notes:
1. All figures are subject to sampling error. Those in square brackets are subject to considerable sampling error.
2. All figures have been rounded to the nearest 10.
3. Estimates of those with incomes above supplementary benefit level are cumulative.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his latest estimate of total social security expenditure in England, Scotland, Wales and the United Kingdom as a whole;

(2) what are the latest estimates of per capita expenditure in England, Scotland, Wales and the United Kingdom as a whole on the following social security benefits: (a) retirement pensions, (b) invalidity benefits, (c) industrial disablement benefit, (d) widows' pensions, (e) dependants' allowance, (f) lump sums to pensioners and (g) supplementary benefit, divided into supplementary pensions and supplementary allowances, unemployment benefit, sickness and injury benefit and maternity allowance.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that in 1984-85 total social security benefit expenditure in the United Kingdom will amount to £38,800 million. Separate estimates for England, Scotland and Wales are not available. however, some indications of social security expenditure in these countries are given in "Regional Trends", published annually by HMSO.

Dundee (Special Needs)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is taking to improve the areas of special needs in the Dundee, West parliamentary constituency, as outlined in his Department's central research unit paper of October 1984.

Mr. Ancram: I have been asked to reply.

Such action is for local authorities (and other local agencies) in the first place. Projects in such areas can qualify for grant under my Department's urban programme.

Smoking-related Diseases

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have died each year since 1974 to 1984 due to smoking-related diseases.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to the reply, 20 November 1984, c. 127]: It is not possible to be precise. Most deaths associated with cigarette smoking arise from three diseases: lung cancer, chronic bronchitis and "heart attacks" due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart. However, the proportion of deaths attributable to smoking from each of these diseases varies. Furthermore, smoking is also implicated in certain other conditions where no estimate of the numbers of the deaths caused by smoking is available—for example, obstruction of the arteries of the lower limbs.

In 1983 the Royal College of Physicians in its Report "Health or Smoking?" estimated that at least 90 per cent. of deaths from lung cancer, chronic bronchitis and obstructive lung disease are attributable to smoking. The total number of deaths from the main conditions involved is given in the table.

England and Wales

Year	Malignant Neoplasm of Trachea bronchus and lung (ICD 162)*	Bronchitis and emphysema (ICD 490-492)

* ICD—International Classification of Diseases.
† Figures for 1983 are provisional.

In the same report the Royal College of Physicians also estimated that perhaps 20 per cent. of deaths due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart were related to smoking. The medical term for this condition is "Ischaemic Heart Disease", but it is nowadays very often referred to as "Coronary Heart Disease". The total number of deaths from this condition between 1974 and 1983 in England and Wales is as follows, but the proportion of these directly attributable to smoking is less certain as this is only one of a number of causes that give rise to obstruction of the arteries of the heart.

Year	Ischaemic Heart Disease (ICD 410-414)
1974	153,250
1975	154,412
1976	157,016
1977	155,813
1978	160,458
1979	155,647
1980	154,371
1981	155,196
1982	154,605
1983*	156,550

* Figures for 1983 are provisional.

The Royal College of Physicians estimate of at least 100,000 smoking-related deaths in 1981 is based upon a total of 70,000 deaths from lung cancer, bronchitis and obstructive lung disease and 180,000 from coronary heart disease; that is, it encompasses conditions not included in the ICD categories, such as various other cancers, other vascular diseases, myocardial degeneration and so on.

Tuberculosis

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what steps he is going to take to ensure that the incidence of tuberculosis amongst hospital medical staff is fully documented;

(2) what plans he has for making sure that hospital staff exposed to risks of contracting tuberculosis receive regular chest radiographs; and what provisions he will make for the purpose of setting up screening programmes for professional foreign visitors attached to National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 28 November 1984, c. 532]: Guidance on the control of tuberculosis in National Health Service employees was issued to health authorities in 1978 on the advice of the Standing Medical Advisory Committee and the working party on the prevention of infection in clinical laboratories. This recommends that staff should have an X-ray and tuberculin test on entry into the NHS and for those at higher risk of exposure to tuberculosis an annual chest X-ray thereafter.

In 1982, we issued guidance on the provision of occupational health services for staff. I would expect these services to have established health records for each member of staff and for those records to record any incidence of tuberculosis, together with a note of chest X-rays, tuberculin testing and BCG vaccination.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much the Post Office measures to counteract the effects of his Department's strike at Newcastle is expected to cost up to the end of 1984.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 6 December 1984, c. 271]: The scale of payments to the Post Office is still a matter of commercial negotiation and full accounting for its additional work will not be available until after the dispute. However, it is estimated that the cost up to the end of December 1984 will be of the order of £65 million to £70 million.

NHS (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the estimated losses of revenue to the National Health Service in the 10 worst cases of undercharging or failure to charge revealed by his recent survey of health authorities' charging arrangements.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 11 December 1984, c. 475]: Although some estimates have been made by auditors, they have yet to be substantiated. Final figures for any losses requiring to be written off will not be available until health authorities have had the opportunity of considering and replying to the audit reports and identifying the sums involved.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the gross income for National Health Service hospitals from charges to road accident victims, private patients and overseas visitors, respectively, and what is the net income in each case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 11 December 1984, c. 475]: Gross income from these three sources in 1983-84 was £6·95 million, £55·455 million and £1·589 million, respectively. It is not practical to try to estimate net figures.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the gross income for National Health Service hospitals from charges to road accident victims, private patients and overseas visitors, respectively, if all such charges had been fully levied.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 11 December 1984, c. 475]: Any estimate would be entirely speculative, but I am very concerned about the substantial evidence that not all the income is being collected. I have therefore written recently to health authority chairmen asking them to ensure that arrangements for collecting income due to the NHS are operating effectively. The NHS scrutiny report on the collection of income was published at the same time. I am arranging for copies of both documents to be placed in the Library.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 69

SESSION 1984-85

3rd December—14th December 1984

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.

Planning Permissions (Misuse)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to alter the law to prevent misuse of planning permissions for dwellings granted on the basis of agricultural need where an agricultural occupancy condition has been imposed.

Mr. MacFarlane: No. Powers for enforcement available to local authorities under existing planning legislation are sufficient to deal with abuses.

GLC (Land)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites and acreage of land at present held by the Greater London council which he proposes to transfer to the London borough of Brent.

Sir George Young: Under clause 92 of the Local Government Bill we intend to transfer to successor bodies all property currently owned by the GLC or MCCs which is needed by them to carry out new or enhanced functions conferred on them. Property which has not been transferred under clause 92, or other specific provisions of the Bill, will vest in the appropriate residuary body. Detailed information about the GLC's holdings of land in the London borough of Brent or any other London borough is not held centrally. In the first instance, it is for such authorities themselves to obtain such information as they require from the GLC.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report, for each parliamentary constituency concerned, the land currently owned by the Greater London council in the county of Essex.

Mr. MacFarlane: This information is not available centrally.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Wolfson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when the report of the independent inquiry by Peat, Marwick and Mitchell into the competitive practices of the Ordnance Survey will be available to him; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the continuation of the publishing activities of the Ordnance Survey in the field of road atlases, town plans and guides;

(3) what net profit has accrued to the Ordnance Survey from the sales of new atlases, town plans and guide books;

(4) why the independent report into the competitive position of the Ordnance Survey joint publishing activities has been submitted to the Ordnance Survey management rather than to him direct.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Leicester (Rate Capping)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the specific reasons why he has rate-capped Leicester city council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend has selected Leicester city council for rate-capping in accordance with the principles stated in the "Rate Limitation Report 1984" (HC 589), laid before the House on 24 July 1984. Authorities were selected if it appeared to him at the date of making the report that their budgets for 1984-85 were more than 4 per cent. above their expenditure targets and more than 20 per cent. above their grant-related expenditure assessment — GREA. Leicester's budget of £24·6 million was 4·9 per cent. above its target and 27·7 per cent above GREA.

The rate limit which my right hon. Friend is now proposing for the council is 56·61 per cent. lower than its rate levied for 1984-85 and should be welcomed by Leicester's ratepayers. The council has until 15 January to comment on the rate limit proposed and to draw my right hon. Friend's attention to any relevant information of which he may not be currently aware.

Docklands

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the occupational categories, by socio-economic group, of the new jobs in London's docklands which are held by residents of the London boroughs of Newham, Tower Hamlets, and Southwark created in docklands since 1981.

Sir George Young: This information is not collected.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown by category, manufacturing, office, distribution, mixed use development, of how many of the estimated 3,185 new jobs created in the London docklands urban development area, excluding Inner Urban Areas Act assistance, since July 1981 were in existing buildings or buildings commenced prior to July 1981.

Sir George Young: Of the 3,185 new jobs created in the LDDC area since July 1981, 2,236 are in existing buildings. By category, these number:

	Number
Industry	*70
Office	†1,010
Distribution	500
Mixed use	656

* Limehouse Studios
† Includes 280 in LDDC offices

The existing buildings in the first three categories required refurbishment before use.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of land in the London Docklands Development Corporation's ownership are awaiting development; and how long this land has been in the London Docklands Development Corporation's ownership.

Sir George Young: Land in the corporation's ownership available for development was purchased in the following years, and was at 31 March 1984 at the stages shown:

Year of purchase	acres awaiting reclamation	acres being reclaimed	acres reclaimed and awaiting disposal/ development
1981-82	187·17	78·47	151·5
1982-83	63·76	19·93	52·7
1983-84	227·91	—	2·0

In addition, the corporation has released—by sale or lease—land purchased in 1981-82, of which 126 acres is being developed and 124·56 acres is already in use.

Urban Development Grant Projects

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide the following information for all urban development grant projects in each London borough that have received at least initial approval by his Department: the name of the project, the value of the urban development grant, the total cost of the project including private sector contributions and the urban development grant expenditure as at 1 October and expected expenditure by 31 March 1985.

Sir George Young: An up-to-date list of all schemes which have received offers of urban development grant, including the name of the sponsoring authority, the total project cost, the maximum estimated UDG, and the total estimated private sector investment, is already in the Library. Detailed information about expenditure incurred at 1 October and anticipated by 31 March 1985 is not at present available.

Local Government Bill

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has published any further guidance on the development plan provisions in the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Yes. I have circulated today to the local authority associations and other interested bodies a paper describing the new system of unitary development plans and the transitional arrangements. I am placing a copy in the Library of the House.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the loss of ancient broadleaved woodlands over the last 30 years; and to what extent new plantings have compensated for this loss.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is no later information about losses of ancient broadleaved woodlands than was provided in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on 20 February 1984 at column 365.

Much new planting of woodlands has taken place over the past, 30 years. In the past 10 years alone, there have been 13,600 hectares of new broadleaved planting and re-stocking by the Forestry Commission and by the private sector with grant aid from the commission. This figure does not take account of compensation of losses by natural regeneration, nor of amenity tree planting grant-aided by the Countryside Commission.

Pollution

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many acres or hectares of trees are affected by the new form of damage reported in the Government reply to the report on acid rain from the Environment Committee, Cmnd. 9397, to have recently been observed in north and west Britain; which species are affected, and in what proportions; and when this new form of damage was (a) first detected and by whom, (b) first publicly recorded and (c) first known to the Government;

(2) if he has any evidence of tree damage associated with air pollution in the United Kingdom;

(3) in what ways the new form of damage to trees reported in the reply to the Environment Committee report on acid rain (Cmnd. 9397), as occurring in north and west Britain resembles that associated with air pollution in Germany; and whether the damage can be explained by the action of pathogenes, fungi, bacteria, stress, drought, climate or other causes not associated with (a) acid deposition and (b) other pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum the Government are currently planning to spend on research into air pollution damage to trees or other plants in the United Kingdom in 1985.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) on 11 December at column 446.

No figure for expenditure during the calendar year 1985 is available.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government are aware of any damage to vegetation by ozone in the United Kingdom over the last three years.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) on 11 December at column 446.
